Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Is it true that Mrs. Bing Crosby is pregnant for the fifth time?
—T. Y., Chicago, Ill.

A. Lately, Bing and Dixie have been frequently appearing in public together. This may be why the rumor (which is untrue) started.

Q. Who are the richest actresses in Hollywood? —C. E., Denver, Col.

A. Those actresses reputed to be most wealthy are Greta Garbo, Corinne Griffith, Claudette Colbert, Irene Dunne, Loretta Young, Ginger Rogers.

Q. Why don't we ever read anything about Betty Hutton's father? Why do stories about her only mention her mother? —V. S., Detroit, Mich.

A. Betty's father was a bigamist who abandoned his wife and two daughters, later was alleged to have been a suicide.

Q. Would you be honest about how many times Alan Ladd's wife, Sue, has been married?—T. R., New York, N. Y.

A. Three times.

Q. I understand that Ida Lupino is 41, and Howard Duff is only 35. Is that on the level? —C. D., Phila., Pa.

A. Ida is two years older than Howard.

Q. Is it true that Mary Jane Barnes, a long-time friend of Paul Douglas, killed herself when Douglas married Jan Sterling? —S. C., New York, N. Y.

A. Miss Barnes' death was declared accidental.

Q. Why won't Loretta Young permit her daughter, Judy, to be photographed for the magazines and newspapers?
—G. W., San Francisco, Cal.

A. Miss Young likes to keep her private life to herself.

Q. Is it true that Van Johnson's popularity declined with his marriage to Keenan Wynn's ex-wife?
—C. C., Boston, Mass.

A. A star's popularity usually corresponds to the number and quality of his latest films.

Q. How come a large studio like Paramount has so few stars? Other than Hope, Crosby, and Hutton, that studio has very little.—P. H., Providence, R. I.

A. Paramount has many stars under contract—at least 25. In addition, the studio recently signed 12 newcomers as members of their Golden Circle.

Q. Can you tell me if Pier Angeli, the girl who played in Teresa, is a twin? If so where is her sister—in Italy?
—S. B., New York, N. Y.

A. Her twin is under contract to Paramount.

Q. When Elizabeth Taylor married Nicky Hilton, Betsy Blair married Gene Kelly, and Janet Leigh married Tony Curtis, did the brides adopt their husbands' religion?
—C. V., Chicago, Ill.

A. In all cases, they did not.

Q. I understand that Alan Ladd left Paramount for Warners because he wants to star in a picture with Doris Day. What will be their first film?
—T. E., Ft. Worth, Tex.

A. Alan Ladd left Paramount only because he felt he wasn't getting the right roles. He will, however, make one film a year for Paramount. He said nothing about wanting to star in a picture with Doris Day.

Q. Since he stopped going with Irene Wrightsman, who is Kirk Douglas dating? —B. G., Boston, Mass.

A. Douglas is in love with his new leading lady, a part Indian girl, Betty Threatt. She and Kirk have the leads in The Big Sky. They met and fell in love this past summer on location in Wyoming.

Q. Are Diana Lynn and John Lindsay happily married?—M. R. Chicago, Ill.

A. This one is destined for the divorce courts. Same old reason, actress-wife won't give up her career and settle down.

IDA LUPINO AND HOWARD DUFF ARE WED . . . LANA'S READY FOR FREEDOM . . . COOP MAKES IT PLAIN PAT NEAL'S FOR HIM.

Ida Lupino and Howard Duff were married October 21, in her home at Glenbrook, Nevada. Judge Clark Guild performed the ceremony.

Maid of honor was Diane Meredith, one of Ida's screen writers. Most of the wedding guests were local townspeople, not celebrities.

The happy couple telephoned Louella before taking a two-day honeymoon in San Francisco. Howard had to return to finish Steel Town.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

STANDING before a fireplace banked with great boughs of pine and flowers and sprays of autumn leaves brought by the neighbors from their gardens, Ida Lupino and Howard Duff were married on October 21, at Glenbrook, Nevada. The ceremony took place in the house where Ida lived during her six weeks residence there. (Rita Hayworth occupied this same house.)

To say a marriage in that town, where so many people take up residence for divorce purposes, was old-fashioned may sound somewhat incongruous. But that's just what Ida and Howard's wedding was—a real old-fashioned affair made possible by the people who live in that part of Nevada.

Rightly enough, those same people who had become Ida's good friends during the six weeks she lived among them, were the chief wedding guests—rather than a contingent of celebrities imported from Hollywood, as might have been expected.

The ceremony was performed by Judge Clark J. Guild. The reception was held in the Dutch kitchen in Ida's cottage, and all day long the neighbors were busy decorating her home, and carrying silver and all the food and cakes they had prepared for the festive occasion.

"I really love this country," Ida told me the day before her wedding, "and I want to come back and visit it and all the people who have been so good to me while I have been here."

I can understand her feeling, for it is beautiful country with its towering pine trees and blue-green lake as clear as crystal.

Ida wore a lavender taffeta afternoon dress and no hat. She carried a white prayer book. Her maid of honor Diane Meredith, the writer who lived with her during all the weeks she spent in Nevada, wore rose.

Howard, who has been very grateful to his agent, Michael Miskekoff, who helped him climb to fame, chose him for his best man. Clark Gable, Ida's neighbor, came over for the reception, but didn't attend the ceremony.

The bridegroom had to work up until time to take the plane to Reno. From there he then had to motor 45 miles to Minden Valley to claim his bride. And a radiant bride she was, believe me.

Ida and Howard have been deeply in love for a long time, something over 18 months, she told me. "In fact, the way I feel now," she said, "there never was anyone but Howard."

This is his first marriage, but Ida previously was married to Louis Hayward, and then Collier Young. Collier sent her a wonderful message wishing her happiness. They still work together as co-producers at RKO, even though they are divorced.

The bride and groom left immediately for a two-day honeymoon in San Francisco, and then Howard had to return to finish his picture, Steel Town, and Ida had to go back to her studio to complete a script she is preparing.

WHEN the blow-off came between Lana Turner and Bob Topping, she was adamant about one thing. She would not give Topping a divorce. There would be a separate maintenance because, as she said, she had worked increasingly to keep her marriage from falling apart and she didn't want to marry again.

I suspect what Lana actually meant was that she didn't want Bob marrying any of these girls he was reported as seeing. Then came Cy Howard into her life. He is a successful composer of radio plays, such as "My Friend Irma" and "Life With Luigi," and, well . . . Lana has fallen hard and is now asking for a divorce.

P.S. Cy fell hard, too, and has forgotten all about Paulette Goddard, his girlfriend of yesterday.

Is Clark Gable, who was so fascinated by the rich widow, Dolly O'Brien, before he married Lady Sylvia Stanley, apt to resume his romance with her now that he is heart free again?

Personally, I doubt it. I think they'll always remain warm friends because they had a lot of good times together in the past, and probably will again. But romance, no. Dolly is a socialite, and her kind of life is not the life for Mr. Gable.

The very attractive Mrs. O'Brien knew this when Clark wanted to marry her and she said, "No" . . . probably the only woman in the world who would have turned down marriage with The King. She said then that their lives were too far apart ever to make a success of marriage, and nothing has happened to change either of them since then.

Dolly was very happy with her first husband, Jay O'Brien, and was desolated at his death. She tried to find happiness again when she married Count Dorelis, but it didn't work out at all.

Gary Cooper and Pat Neal, it's plain to see, no longer are trying to conceal their romance of long standing. He escorted her to one of the biggest parties of the year, the glamorous dinner dance Mike and Gloria Romanoff gave in honor of Mrs. Dolly O'Brien, and during the evening they certainly did nothing to disguise their enchanted interest in each other.

Moreover, it was their second public appearance together within the week. Just two nights before, Gary took Pat to the birthday party he gave for his mother at the Bel Air Hotel, and seated her in the honor spot next to his mother. If there is any more public way of announcing your affections, I don't know what it could be.

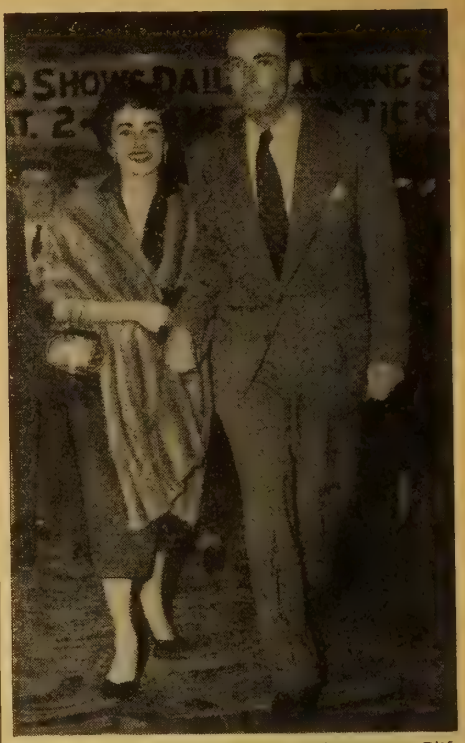
There was quite an awkward moment at the Romanoff party, incidentally, when Rocky Cooper, Gary's estranged wife, walked in with Cesar Romero. Mike and Gloria handled it tactfully, however, by seating the two couples at tables as far apart as possible.

The party was very gay, with the ballroom beautifully decorated in red and white, and the guest list looked like Who's Who in Hollywood's Social Set. Kay Spreckles came with her bodyguard, which she explained by saying her estranged husband, Adolph, the sugar millionaire, had been "threatening" her. Mrs. Gable also came alone, her first appearance

Dial Soap keeps complexions clearer by keeping skin cleaner!

Dial's AT-7 (hexachlorophene) removes blemish-spreading bacteria that other soaps leave on skin.

The cleaner your skin, the better your complexion. And mild, fragrant Dial with AT-7 gets your skin cleaner and clearer than any other kind of soap. It's as simple as that. Dial's bland beauty-cream lather gives you scrupulous cleanliness to overcome clogged pores and blackheads. You do far more than remove dirt and make-up when you wash thoroughly every day with Dial. Dial with AT-7 effectively clears skin of bacteria that often aggravate and spread pimples and surface blemishes. Skin doctors know this, and recommend Dial for both adults and adolescents.



Protect your complexion with fine, fragrant Dial Soap.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Is it romance? Liz Taylor and Monty Clift caused a stir in New York's Palace Theater lobby when they attended Judy Garland's show.

at a big party in Hollywood since she and The King separated.

Doris Duke again was with her former husband, Porfirio Rubirosa, which set everyone to wondering if maybe she won't remarry him one of these days. It's funny, but those two seem to be much better friends now than when they were man and wife. Another "ex" couple were Jean and Charlie Feldman, who danced almost every dance together. Maybe they'll patch things up, too.

The gowns of the gals were fabulously beautiful . . . and fabulously expensive, I'll bet. Dolly O'Brien's was a dream of filmy white, but Evie Johnson's really stole the spotlight. It was a Fontana model of flesh colored lace, embroidered from top to toe with tiny pearls, with a cascade of roses and ribbons down one side. Van must have yelled more than "Ouch!" when he got the bill for it.

Miss Romina Francesca Power, whose happy father, Mr. Tyrone Power, has been on Cloud A ever since she dropped from Heaven straight into his heart, is the spittin' image of her good looking Dad.

Grandma Patia Power says Romina looks exactly as Ty did as a baby. She has his features and his dark hair, but the shapely ears and dainty hands and feet of her beautiful mother, Linda Christian Power.

All babies are sweet and good, of course, but Linda insists this so-welcome infant really has the disposition of an angel; she sleeps all the time and only awakens to take her bottle, a formula consisting of condensed milk and water.

Romina Francesca's first home was the Bel Air hotel, because she arrived a few weeks before her parents expected her. Within a few days, however, she moved into the Barker estate in Bel Air, which Ty bought as soon as the baby's arrival was certain. He and Linda had two previous disappointments and they wanted to be sure before they actually bought a big house.

The spacious and sunny nursery, a boudoir fit for a little princess, is done in green and white, with white, green and yellow drapes. The furniture—crib, chairs, weighing table and all else, is white. The walls are gayly decorated with various animal figures, which lend a little color.

Ty and Linda chose the name Romina Francesca because they were married in Rome in the Church of St. Francesca. This way, they say, they have a living monument to that wonderful day and place. And what a cute monument she'll grow up to be!

You wonder sometimes why Mitzi Gaynor doesn't run down. She is so excited she is on high all the time. Life to her is just one great big beautiful bubble.

The day she started the I Don't Care Girl, her studio tried to make it like a first night and succeeded, I must say. Richard Coyle, whom Mitzi says she is going to marry September 4, 1952, sent her a great basket of white orchids.

He is the young attorney, who, with his mother, is living at Mitzi's house with her mother. Just one happy little family. I wonder if Mitzi really will get married come September? It's so far away she's safe in saying it, anyway. She will be 21 then, and that's why she is putting the date so far ahead, she says.

I guess it always takes a man to make us girls perk up and look our prettiest, and that goes even for the aloof Greta Garbo.

The tongues in Paris were wagging plenty when she first arrived there looking like the proverbial "rag, and a bone, and a hank of hair." Her clothes were rumpled and messy, and her uncombed hair hung every which way about her face.

It was a different story a few nights later, however, when she came to a dinner party at Maxim's on the arm of novelist John Gunther. As you know, he's writing the story of Eleanor Duse's romance with d'Annunzio, which Garbo is planning to make at MGM next year.

This time Miss G. was her old mysterious self, and all eyes were on her as she made her entrance in a pencil slim black dinner gown, cut fairly low in the neck. With it she wore a strand of diamonds, and her coiffure was sleek and shining.

I never have been able to understand why Garbo, who is such a natural beauty, deliberately seems to try to make herself as unattractive as possible off screen. Maybe it's protective coloration in reverse.

In the case of Peggy Dow, persistence won for Walter Helmerich III, rich Tulsa millionaire. He has been begging her to marry him for two years.

Helmerich is young, handsome and has lots of money, but that's not what made Peggy say yes. She finally decided she loved her career, but not more than her Tulsa boyfriend.

By the time you read this they will have married in Athens, Tennessee, Peggy's hometown. The Governor, the Mayor, and other state dignitaries have accepted wedding invitations.

Peggy's gown, made right in Athens, was white with the conventional veil. Her bridesmaids also wore white gowns.

Well, here it is, girls, the intimate lowdown on very tall, very slim, and very handsome Carleton Carpenter, the chap most of you fans asked me about this month.

Incidentally, after watching Carleton and cute Debbie Reynolds at this year's Photographers' Ball, I can understand why he "fractures" so many of you. He and Debbie came dressed as tramps, and their "Abba-Dabba-Dabba" duet was a show-stopper, even though he was coming down with a cold and had a temperature of over 100.

First of all, "Carp" lives in bachelor diggings in Westwood which are furnished in New England farmhouse style. He is a "bouncer" by nature, hopping from chair to chair in a room, and from subject to subject in a conversation.

Debbie Reynolds, Joan Evans, Ann Francis and Diane Douglas are his favorite Hollywood dates. And, by the way, he's a pretty set young man in his ideas on women. Too many girls, he says, are more interested in getting married than in BEING married, which is a mistake. He doesn't believe careers and marriage mix, which means a career will be "out" for his wife. He does like a girl to have a mind of her own, though, and not be afraid to express it.

"Carp" has one phobia: he hates to make dates in advance. But with his charm and good looks, most any girl would say yes to a last minute invite. Or don't you agree?

Old Man Stork certainly has been a busy bird out 20th Century-Fox way, but there's a different angle to the interest in his next visit—to Micheline Prelle in December.

So far, he's left two girls (to the Ty Powers and the John Hodiaks) and two boys (to the Richard Basehearts and the Louis Jourdans), and Micheline's baby will break the tie in the Stork Derby.

Hollywood is talking about Elizabeth Taylor's reluctance to give up Nicky Hilton to Countess Betsy Von Furstenberg. They're also discussing Betsy's strange new dignity about this situation.

And they're talking about the number of ex-wives who choose their divorced or estranged husbands as escorts. Well, that way the girls know what they're getting, and there is a scarcity of men!

They're laying down bets on who Betty Hutton will pick as her next engagement victim; and why a girl as nice as Betty does such screwy things.

Our town is happy over the new-found happiness of Dixie and Bing Crosby. They act as they did when they first met 20 years ago, and a wonderful new understanding has developed between them, which makes Hollywood happy, too.

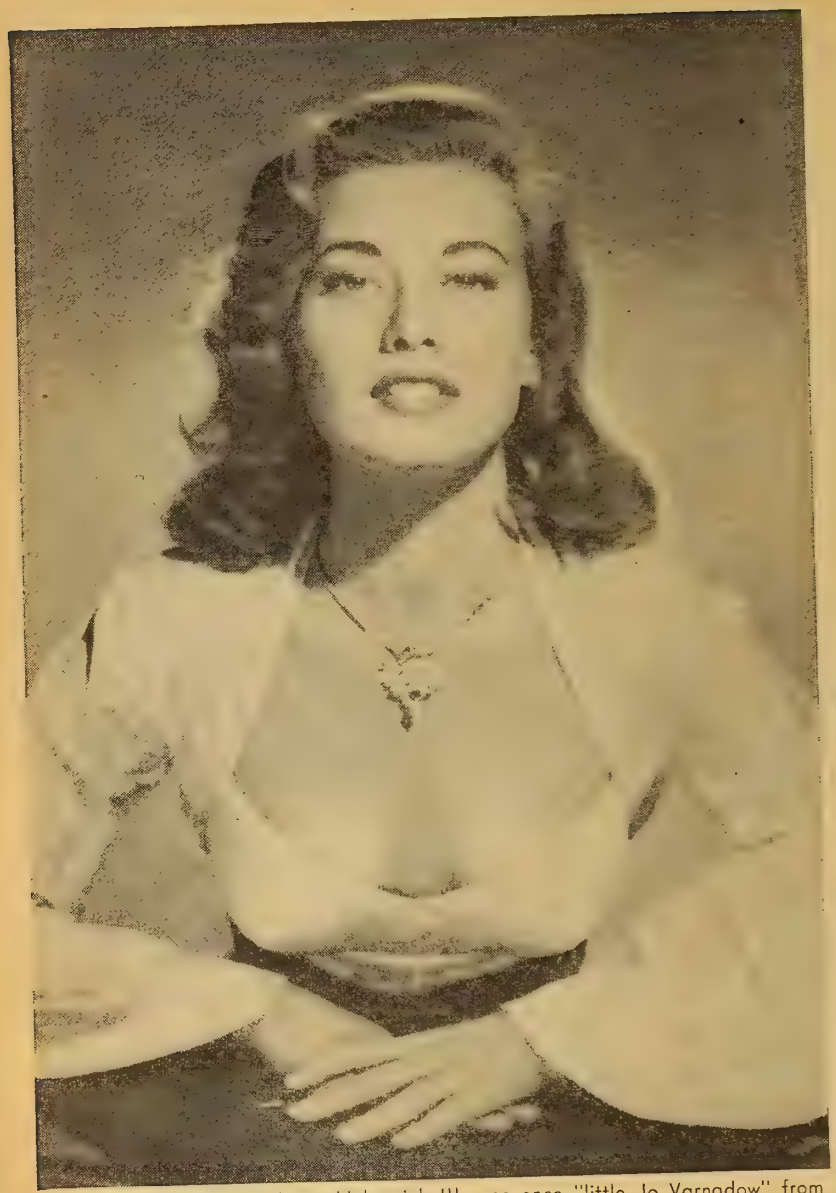
And they're still talking about the costume Joan Crawford wore to the Photographer's Ball. It was a Chinese coolie coat, which came just above her knees. Well, with legs like hers, who would want to hide them?

Many of your letters this month wondered about Rita Hayworth and the Moslem religion, and hoped she would return to her old faith now that Aly Khan no longer has a place in her life. Quite a few of you, too, asked about Ava Gardner's and Frank Sinatra's marriage. But, by the time this is in print, I expect they either will be married, or will have said goodbye to love.

Tony Dexter continues to lead in a walk as the femme rave; and don't think you can knock Mario Lanza and get away with it. His fans are more loyal than ever.

Keep your letters coming . . . the more the merrier! We always like to know what interests you most, and what you want to read about.

Judy Garland's triumphant opening night at the Palace drew many celebrities. Marlene Dietrich rushed backstage to congratulate her.



One of the most appealing couples at the annual Press Photographers' Ball was hobo Gene Nelson and his grand lady—Miriam.

Hollywood wore its best at the premiere of A Streetcar Named Desire. Glittering among the stars were Ann Miller and Dan Dailey.

Peggy Dow, now Mrs. Walter Helmerich III, was once "little Jo Varnadow" from Athens, Tennessee. She came to Hollywood via Gulf Park Junior College, where she originally met Walter. Their courtship got underway in New York, two years ago.

She dared to hurt his pride; she dared to send him away to prove himself. Peggy Dow risked heartbreak for future happiness — and won.

BY LOUISE McILVAIN

They had flying visits together. Walter was working in the oil-fields of Oklahoma; Peggy was making movies. But love blossomed into marriage on November 24.

■ ". . . and then, of course, you respect me," the handsome young suitor said to beautiful Peggy Dow.

"But I don't respect you," she interrupted. The gentleness of her voice didn't lessen the shock of her harsh words.

When he recovered, he demanded, "And exactly what are your requirements for respecting someone?"

"Showing he has what it takes to do something on his own," Peggy retorted to the would-be writer whose few story sales certainly hadn't financed his lavish courtship of her. A very successful and generous father had done that.

Walter Helmerich III stormed out of Peggy's presence that day.

Days passed into weeks, and weeks into months. There were no more telephone calls to Peggy from New York where he maintained a very nice apartment. Nor from Tulsa, Oklahoma, where he spent part of the time with his parents on their lavish 10-acre estate. No more pages-long telegrams. No letters. Gone were the daily gardenias with poetic notes attached.

No matter what the calendar said, the heart insisted that those two months of silence were decades.

GABLE'S DIVORCE PROBLEM

Millions of dollars are involved. Famous names will be tossed around. The "King" is up against the most expensive fight of his life.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

■ In Hollywood, the unwritten law says that no actor must file for a divorce.

Should an actor and his wife strongly disagree—and this is putting it mildly in the case of Clark and Sylvia Gable—then it is the little woman who must sue the actor and not vice versa.

The reason for this is that the actor must remain gallant in the eyes of the public. No matter how strong his case, he mustn't plead it. After all, how gentlemanly would it look for a man to accuse his wife of mental cruelty?

Clark Gable was willing to go along with the game. It was his understanding that his bride of 17 months and six days would file for a divorce in May. And Lady Sylvia did.

On the eve of a leisurely trip aboard George Vanderbilt's yacht to Hawaii, Lady Sylvia announced that she had filed a divorce complaint in the California Superior Court. At the time, she said she wanted absolutely nothing from her tall, handsome graying husband, and was in fact, acting only on his request.

It was Clark, she intimated, who wanted their marriage dissolved. Not she. A few weeks previously (Continued on page 84)

"You'll see Nero and the burning of Rome in 'Quo Vadis'. And if you know how steam heat parches your skin, you can imagine how dry mine felt after making that scene. I had to be photographed inches away from live, crackling flames.

Soaking in water for this escape scene dried my skin again . . .

And later, 'my hands were tied', literally, with a harsh rope . . .

So I soothed my hands, arms and face with Jergens Lotion . . .

It kept them lovely and smooth-as-silk for romantic close-ups.

At home, too, Jergens Lotion is my head-to-toe beauty secret"...

Being liquid, Jergens is quickly absorbed by thirsty skin . . .

CAN YOUR LOTION OR HAND CREAM PASS THIS "FILM TEST"?

To soften, a lotion or hand cream should be absorbed by the upper layers of the skin. Jergens Lotion contains quickly-absorbed ingredients that doctors recommend — no heavy oils that merely coat the skin. Proof? Water won't "bead" on a hand smoothed with Jergens Lotion as with a lotion or hand cream that leaves a heavy, oily film.

You can prove it yourself with the simple test described above...

You'll see why Hollywood stars prefer Jergens Lotion 7-to-1!

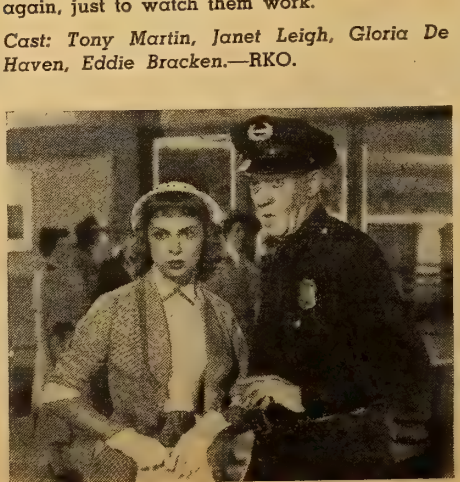
TOO YOUNG TO KISS

June Allyson is a concert pianist, but she can't get manager Van Johnson to listen to her, he's so rich and busy. Discovering that he's due to judge a child musicians' contest, she knocks her knees, shortens her skirts, covers her teeth with an old dental brace, and forces her way into the tots' competition. Naturally, she wins. Johnson, who realizes you find an infant prodigy once in a lifetime, practically adopts her, despite the fact that she seems to be an extraordinarily vicious child. She drinks and smokes and kisses men passionately whenever she gets the chance. You can probably figure out the ending; the music is enjoyable, the performance lots of fun.

Cast: June Allyson, Van Johnson, Gig Young, Paula Gorday.—MGM.

DETECTIVE STORY



Sidney Kingsley's hit play, revised just enough to suit the movie censors, is turned into a powerful picture by Paramount. Kirk Douglas plays the psychopathic police officer who has no compassion for any human weakness. Eleanor Parker plays his wife with an illegitimate baby in her past. And their little tragedy unfolds against the bleak, unlovely background of a precinct squad room. Oddly enough, from my point of view at least, the minor characters were all better actors than the major ones. Lee Grant, whose "shoplifter" portrayal made her famous on Broadway, repeats the performance here. While I personally feel she's still playing for the stage —she's magnificent; so, also, are two crooks played by Joseph Wiseman and Michael Strong. Detective Story is a moving experience, and terrific entertainment.

Cast: Kirk Douglas, Eleanor Parker, William Bendix.—Paramount.

TWO TICKETS TO BROADWAY

I guess the old-time musicals are over. Used to be that beautiful girls would come to New York hoping to work for Rodgers and Hammerstein. Now they all want to get on television. Consider the story of small-town Janet Leigh. She arrives in New York, meets indigent singer Tony Martin, whose agent is also agent for three out-of-work actresses (Gloria De Haven, Ann Miller, Barbara Lawrence). This agent, namely, Eddie Bracken, is a disreputable snake. After much lying, starving, and shenanigans, they all get on the Bob Crosby TV show, and the final number has Janet reclining on a large bed, while Tony sings to her. Maybe it ain't good taste, but it sure is Hollywood. Best touch in the picture: the casting of old vaudeville team Smith and Dale as delicatessen proprietors. They are truly hilarious, and I would sit through the entire 106 minutes again, just to watch them work.

Cast: Tony Martin, Janet Leigh, Gloria De Haven, Eddie Bracken.—RKO.

I WANT YOU

Samuel Goldwyn continues his investigation of what he considers to be average American families (Best Years Of Our Lives, Our Very Own), this time in the year 1950. Peace isn't really peace in 1950, what with men dying in Korea, but the Greer family (Robert Keith and Mildred Dunnock, parents; Dana Andrews, older son; and Farley Granger, kid brother) feel relatively removed from the problem. Dana was in the army four years, Farley's got a trick knee that will defer him. The times can't be ignored, so Dana decides he has to go back into the army, even though his wife (Dorothy McGuire) cries, "Is two years the limit that people can expect to be happy these days?" As for Farley, he's drafted, irons out a romantic problem of his own, with Peggy Dow. Picture's slow getting started, but has some immensely moving scenes—notably one (Continued on page 90)

■ At the end of every year, all Hollywood sits back and takes stock of its successes and failures—the great films and the duds; the stars who've won new glory and the stars who've begun to fall. And one night in March of every year, Hollywood's Supreme Court—the Academy Awards—selects the outstanding films and performances. But for the all-important popularity ratings, Hollywood is not the judge. That role belongs to you—the four-and-a-half million readers of MODERN SCREEN. Your choice of the top 10, as recorded on MODERN SCREEN's Popularity Poll, has become increasingly important to Hollywood ever since the first results were announced 10 years ago. It is with the warmest congratulations, therefore, that we present here the list of winners for 1951. Congratulations to them—and to you who've made them great.

It was just 10 years ago that a new actor appeared in a movie called This Gun For Hire. MODERN SCREEN readers clamored to hear more about him. That was Hollywood's first indication of Alan Ladd's fabulous magnetism. You know what happened. Ladd jumped to the heights, and he stayed there . . . A few years later, another young player captured the hearts of MODERN SCREEN's readers. His name was Van Johnson, and pretty soon it was in the spotlight . . . In 1950, an unknown actor, who'd had only a few brief roles, somehow attracted your attention, (Continued on page 75)

John married Esperanza in 1946; she was a movie star in Mexico.

Duke calls his wife "Chata." He has four children by a former marriage.

His acting made him top box-office star, but John produces hits, too.

He'll never outgrow Westerns. Fans like these kids won't ever let him.

Tops at the box office, tops on MODERN SCREEN'S Popularity Poll. That's John Wayne, a big quiet hunk of dynamite.

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

■ One summer afternoon, back in 1927, a hulking young USC football player called Duke Morrison plied a broom repetitiously on a Hollywood set, and found the going very monotonous indeed.

All day, while an exacting director named John Ford tried vainly for a tricky emotional scene, he had tossed brown paper leaves across the camera, then stepped in and swept them up to toss them all over again. Duke was earning money to get back to college and play varsity tackle, and what furrowed his rugged brow was not the art of the screen drama, but the fast Notre Dame fullback he'd have to stop next season. That camera crew tempers were short as firecracker fuses and John Ford anxiously chewing his handkerchief to confetti didn't register on Duke a bit.

So when he heard, "Action!" again he chucked in his leaves and never noticed the rapt "This one's it!" expression on the director's face. Automatically, Duke ambled forward and started sweeping. Only when the air turned blue with outraged curses did he notice that the camera was still whirring. When he swivelled his startled mug into the lens he knew he had committed a sin in Hollywood as mortal as murdering your own grandmother. He had ruined a perfect "take."

That chagrined stare on the set of Four Sons was the first performance John Wayne, as he's known today, ever played in Hollywood. Needless to state, it never saw the light of a theater screen, nor did he get a nickel for the realistic job. But he did win an award.

After indignant huskies had grabbed him, "pantsed" him, and goosestepped him around the set, they decorated him with an iron cross twisted from ten-penny nails and bent him over double. From a running start, John Ford aimed a kick at his sittsfleisch and scored a goal. Duke didn't get fired, but it wasn't exactly an auspicious start in the picture business. THESE STARS WILL SHARE THE LIMELIGHT OF 1952! THAT'S HEDDA'S PREDICTION—THE LADY BACKS IT UP WITH FACTS YOU CAN NOT IGNORE.

Ava Gardner will be Miss Glamor of 1952. In Pandora and the Flying Dutchman, she has more sex appeal than anyone since Garbo.

Cameron Mitchell, Broadway hit in Death of a Salesman, made 20th sit up and take notice.

Dean Miller panned Hollywood to a stranger, on a train. Stranger was Dore Schary, who signed him.

MY PREDICTIONS FOR 1952

by Hedda Hopper

Will their careers bring them more fame? Will their private lives bring them happiness? One of Hollywood's foremost crystal gazers peers into the futur for a good look at tomorrow.

Lanza will be one of the hottest actors of '52. Wait till you hear him sing "Because You're Mine."

Singin' in the Rain is the picture that'll put Debbie Reynolds' name high on theater marquees.

Mitzi Gaynor will hit the jackpot when The I Don't Care Girl (Eva Tanguay story) is released.

After Debra Paget made Bird of Paradise, her studio was swamped with fan mail.

Rock Hudson was neglected until Universal execs saw what he could do in Bend of the River.

Sexy Marilyn Monroe is still a long way from being a Duse, but that won't keep her from stardom.

After The Merry Widow is released, fans will be sighing over Argentina's handsome Fernando Lamas.

The public discovered easy-going Dale Robertson at the preview of a minor film.

Anne Francis came to Hollywood via TV and got the title role in her first movie, Lydia Bailey.

Teresa won Pier Angeli acclaim. Handled well, she'll climb to the top. Appears next with Stewart Granger.

John Harrison rated raves for Saturday's Hero, rated role in newest Judy Holliday film.

■ There I was minding my own business for a change (I said it first) when the phone rang.

"Hello, Hedda," said the editor of MODERN SCREEN, "polish up your crystal ball. It's time for your annual predictions. How's about telling our readers who'll be up and who'll be down, who'll be loved and who'll be left at the altar in Hollywood in 1952?"

"Who—me?" I said. "Or don't you remember? I'm the gal who predicted that in 1951, and I quote, 'Elizabeth Taylor and Nick Hilton will make a happy go of their marriage.' And, 'Janet Leigh won't love Tony Curtis half as much as her brilliant new picture breaks. So she'll keep saying No.' And, 'Clark Gable and his lady fair will grow cozier and cozier out on the farm. And—lots more . . ."

"Hedda, Hedda," interrupted the editor, "you also predicted, and I quote, 'Shirley Temple will change her name to Mrs. Charles Black and give up her Hollywood career.' And, 'The Dan Daileys will sign their bill of divorcement and Dan will play the field.' And, 'Farley Granger will live alone and like it, and so will his old sweetie, Shelley Winters.' I'd say your predictions were 88 per cent right, Hedda. So—get out your crystal ball, and even if it is slightly cracked, get busy with those 1952 predictions."

Well, here I go again. Another year. 1952—with its comedies and tragedies, it's romances, rifts and, unfortunately, its unsavory headlines. (Continued on page 66)

Someday he'll come along—that man you love. But until he does it's a problem being a girl. I know! Here's what I've learned about handling men.

what to do 'til the minister comes

by Piper Laurie

■ Between the time you grow out of childhood and the day you get married—what do you do? Sit and pine? Mix around and force the issue? Swim in a sea of romantic hoping? Plunge into the forgetfulness of work, art or whatever, and let love come when it may? Play safe? Play with fire? Oh, it's a problem to be a girl . . .

Should you be frightened about yourself when someone you know gets married? Should you be frightened and say, "Look at them! It's so wonderful. And here I am, 19 (or 18, or 21 or 25,) and not married yet!" Or is this too dangerous a feeling? Will it make you over-eager and unable to use good judgment so that you had best talk yourself out of any such enthusiasm quickly? Or should you be frightened because another girl has married and it becomes known that things aren't going well with her, and now the whole proposition of marriage seems risky? Should you be bold and seek out or should you be bashful and be sought out? What to do during that anxious in-between?

There are words I heard somewhere that say, in effect, that these years of young womanhood are the most trying of all. I think this is so. I think a girl often feels she isn't actually living, but just suspended in life. Of course she sometimes has the power to alter the situation. But how . . . and should she? With me the trouble is that I don't know whether to use my heart or my head as guide . . . or the exact proportion of each. (I think the right mixture is the important thing.) I often realize that I had better use my head, but on the other hand, it's my heart that I want to take care of.

I think I started to worry about all this before it was time to worry. Was that just me, or is it common with girls? I can remember my first big project was to get concrete proof of my femininity. This was when I was 11 and I just had to know what my girl-power was. I talked my family into letting a boy we knew take me to a movie matinee. He was to have dinner with us afterwards but when we got back into the lobby of our apartment house I wasn't in a hurry to go upstairs. We talked and I don't remember how it happened, or even if I maneuvered it, but suddenly he was trying to kiss me. Of course, I refused. What I was after right then was information, not experience. And I had it. He wanted to . . . and that's all I wanted to know. But he asked why I wouldn't and my answer was that we were too young. He acted as if he thought this was quite reasonable.

"Then when can we?" he wanted to know.

I can still remember how intriguing I found this question. I took it seriously. In the next few seconds of silence I was (Continued on page 86)

It started 10 years ago when we were married . . . and every Christmas since has been a double holiday, a double blessing.

Christmas Love Story

■ Just a few days before Christmas, at three o'clock in the afternoon on the 22nd, to be exact, Miriam and I will be celebrating our tenth wedding anniversary. And this year it's going to be a big day. This year, jolly old St. Nick will have to crawl into the back seat while the Nelsons take over.

After all, it is not every day that you have been married for 10 years.

Every year up to now, it has seemed that somehow, without our even realizing it, our anniversary has always blended into the celebration of Christmas itself. During the war, when the very spirit of Christmas was a terrible reminder that you were separated from the ones you loved, the day was marked by a special kind of loneliness. Later, when we were settled, it was the occasion of some of our finest moments of friendship and good fellowship.

Smiling pretty for the people at Ciro's, Lana is with Cy Howard whom she started to date shortly after her separation from Bob Topping.

Lana's learned the facts of love the hard way. She's been used and abused. But she'll never get men out of her hair— or her heart.

BY STEVE CRONIN

No more tears for Turner—at least that's what Lana says.

"My marriage to Bob is over," she admits, "and I'm reconciled to that. There's no sense in re-hashing things. A girl must forget and look to the future."

Does she mean a future without love? It doesn't seem likely, for looming very large in Lana's life today is Cy Howard, a tall, dark haired radio producer who is recognized in Hollywood as a "character."

"Characters" have a way of capturing Lana's fancy, probably because average men bore her too easily. She likes her male escorts to be sharp, witty, and colorful. Cy Howard qualifies. He knows all the answers.

Cy was born 35 years ago in Milwaukee. His big claim to fame is that he was the creator of two outstanding radio shows, "My Friend Irma" and "Life with Luigi." He has also written the Irma motion pictures and That's My Boy, which starred Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin.

Cy Howard has been described in the press as, "uncouth, brash, vain," and not particularly well-bred. But he is tall, dark, handsome and talented. That's the type Lana has specialized in. Greg Bautzer, Artie Shaw, Steve Crane, Ty Power, Bob Topping all fill the bill.

Just how serious she is about Cy, Lana isn't saying. "He's very nice, and he's a lot of laughs," is the limit of her description. There's little doubt, though, that Howard is helping her to forget the past.

A few months ago, as you'll recall, Lana was in pretty bad shape mentally. She was trying (Continued on page 85)

it's a great life

Haver looks fragile, but, oh boy! She'll trim you at tennis, beat you at golf, run you ragged in her zest for life!

BY JIM HENAGHAN

■ When she was 14 years old, June Haver lived in the small city of Rock Island, Illinois, far away from the make-believe of Hollywood. One Sunday morning, June and her sister, Evelyn, stood in the teeming rain before their house and tried to think of something to do to amuse themselves.

"I know," said June, "let's go to church."

"Which one?" asked Evelyn.

"Let's go to the Catholic church," said June.

"But that's across the trestle," said Evelyn. "It's kind of dangerous."

"Sure it is," said June, "but it will be fun—and we really ought to go to some church, you know."

Evelyn agreed, so the girls set out and walked until they came to a railroad bridge high above a span of river and canyon. Then, one behind the other, they began to cross, stepping over the ties and laughing as they did so. It was fun, but if a train had appeared the girls would most certainly have been injured—for there was no place to go but down from their narrow cat walk.

When they reached the other side, they found the church which was dry and warm, and they entered a rear pew for the mass. Although neither of them were Catholics, they knelt and prayed in silence, and when the services were over they made their way home the same way they had come—and called it a splendid morning.

This incident is typical of June Haver—and demonstrates a character and personality that is hers today as it was then. She is a devout girl, but a scamp; a religious girl who seldom stops laughing and enjoying the excitement of life. (Continued on page 76)

June's a crack decorator. Often does friends' houses; sends the fee to a pet charity.

Outdoor sports are her meat. She excels at parlor games, too, and is quite a practical joker.

Golf is her favorite pastime, and she's good at it. She plays when she's free—rain or shine.

A frequent visitor to veterans' hospitals, she's adored by soldiers like John Noyes.

Full of the devil?
Not Mario. He's lusty, he's loud, he's full of laughs. And if that's bad you'll have to take it—or leave Lanza alone!

BY CARL SCHROEDER

Mario beams as his wife follows Kathryn Grayson's example in kissing Norman Taurog, Lanza's director at MGM. Betty is very helpful in creating good public relations for Mario.

He's almost cut out impromptu concerts; but he'll sing any time for the kids. When admiring young musicians like these drop in on the set, Mario is always ready to oblige.

"they can't make me behave"

■ There was great anger in the heart and mind of Mario Lanza. He also had a sprained ankle and a severe pain in the neck.

He stood at the desk of Dore Schary, big chief of MGM, and tried to quell the righteous fury that welled up inside him.

Mr. Lanza was being told, politely, but firmly, that a different sort of general behavior was expected of him in the future. Mario listened. He leaned on his cane and wished he could sit down. He shifted uncomfortably.

Suddenly, Mr. Schary stopped talking. He waited for Mario's reply, but there was none forthcoming. Instead, the seconds ticked on in miserable silence. Inside, Mario Lanza turned deep purple.

Then the explosion came. Mario raised his cane and broke it violently over Mr. Schary's desk. Ink spilled. Cigarettes bounced high out of a leather desk tray. Dore Schary shoved back his chair, and watched in amazement as Mario Lanza limped away through the outer office, shouting down violent threats and ill wishes for all of the movie industry within the sound of his voice.

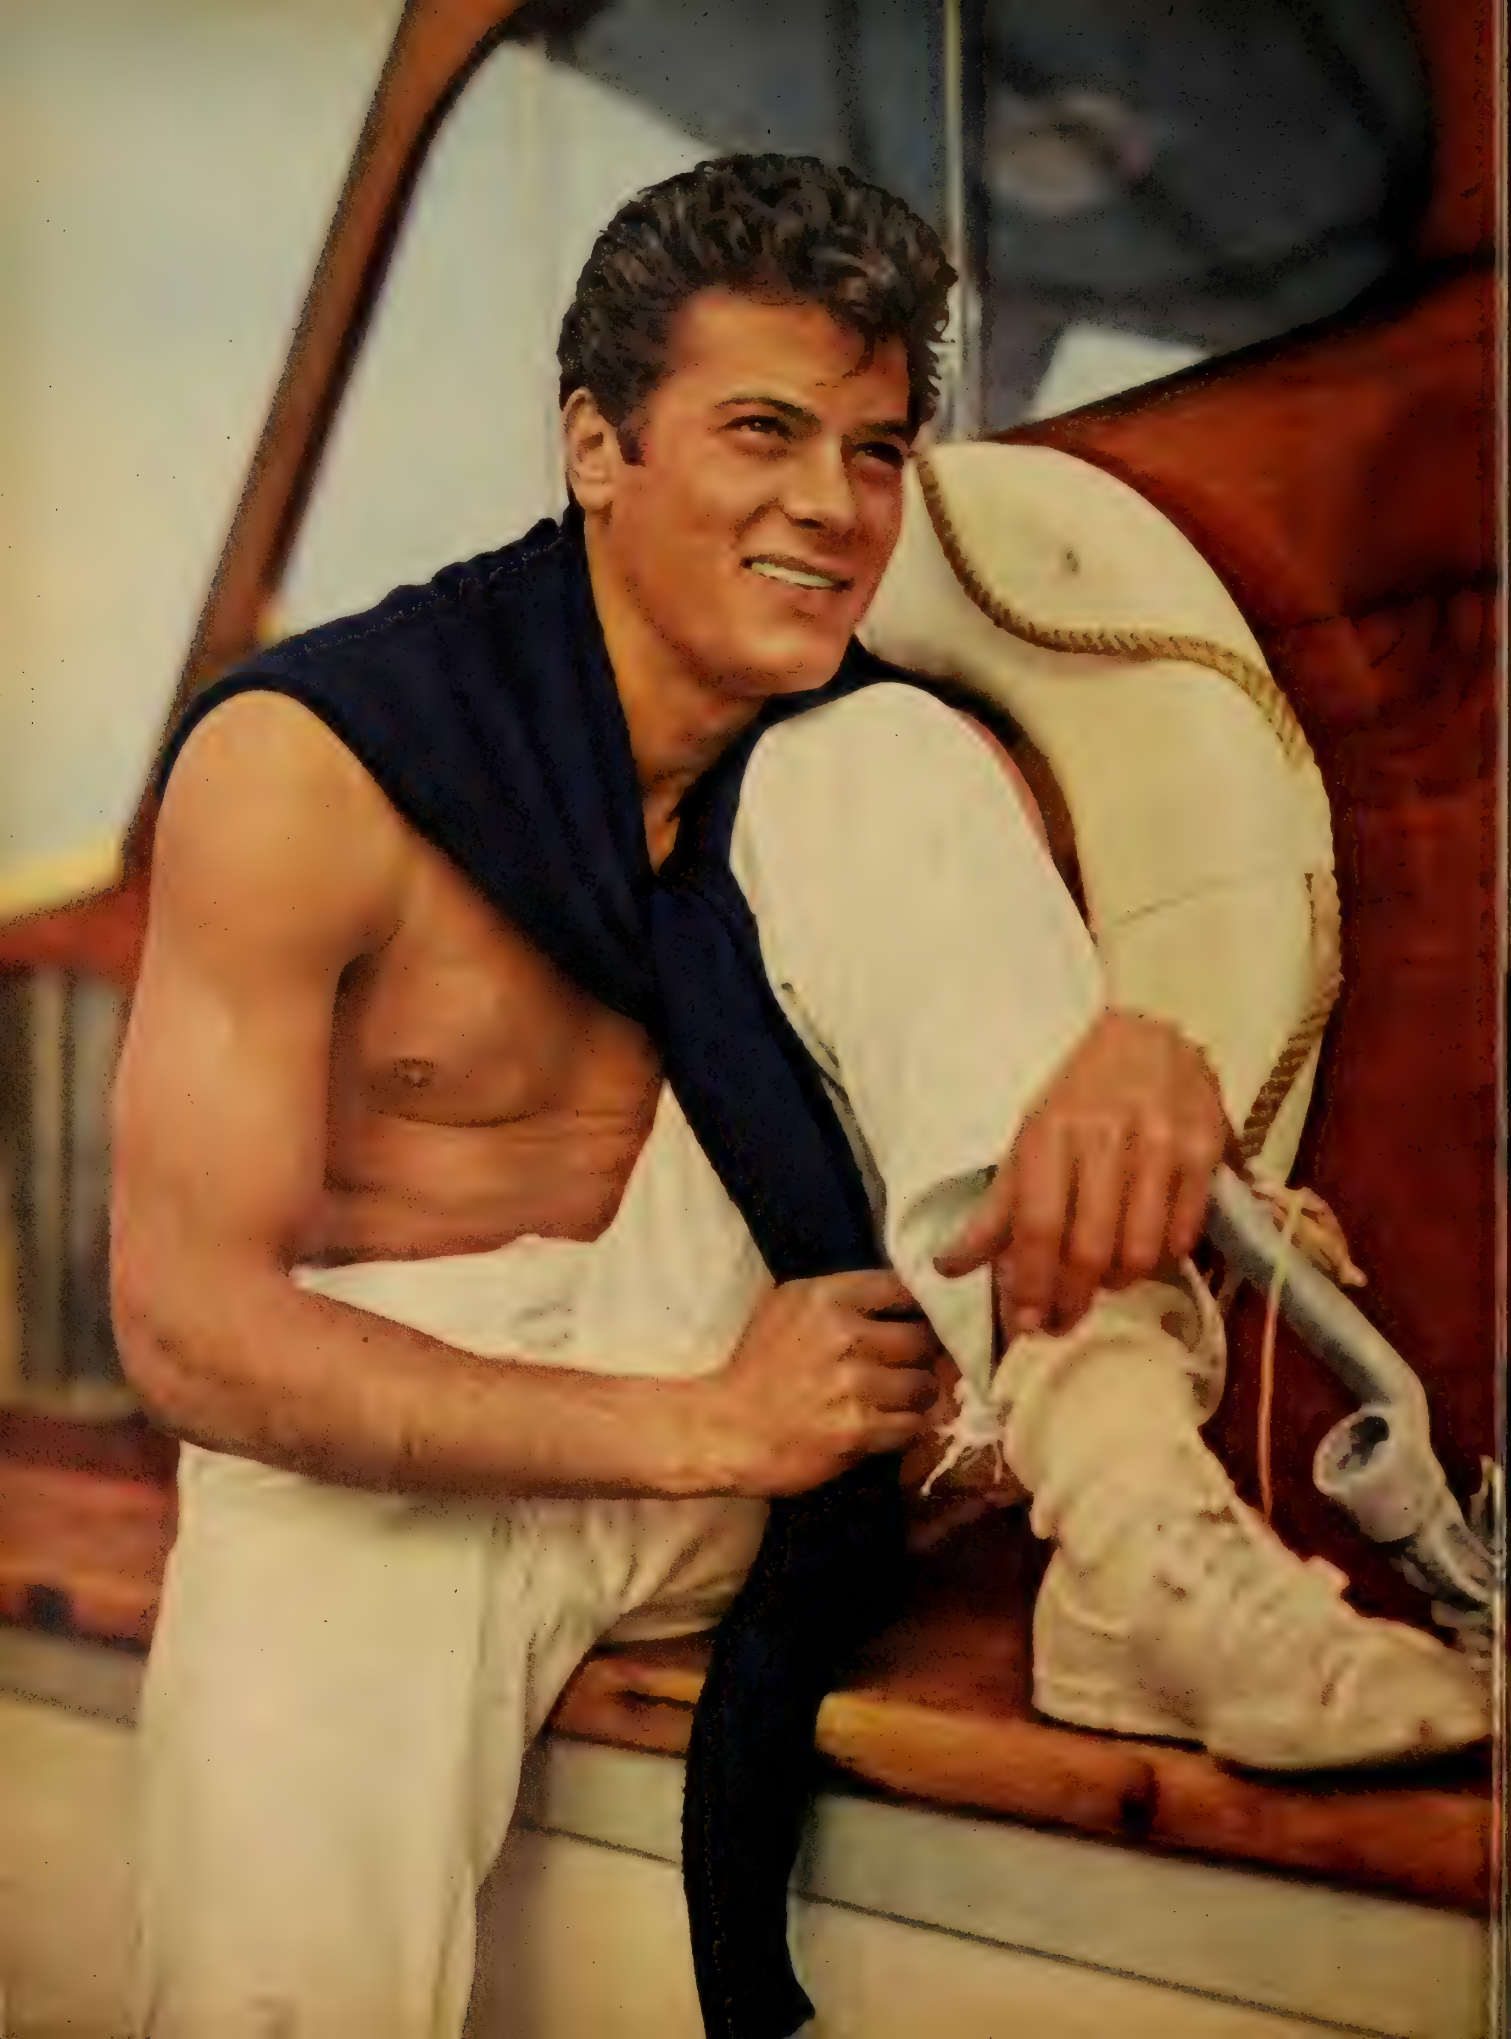
"Temperamental? They say I am temperamental? How ridiculous!"

Mario Lanza was telling me about his strange encounter with the big boss. He sat at a long desk in his home on Whittier Drive in Beverly Hills, grinning with high good humor. He wore one of his extra loud sport shirts, with extra short sleeves. Most of his strongly muscled arms were in view, and obviously they did not have an extra ounce of fat upon them.



"You are not going to get me wrong," he said. "You—I can see it in your eyes—are going to tell the truth about Mario Lanza, so there will be no more trouble with all these lies!"

"No more trouble?" My voice sounded a bit incredulous.

"Well, with me, I guess there will always be some excitement. But there will be no more misunderstanding. I am a young man. I have a violent love for living in my veins. I am not going to behave like some people want me to behave. I don't think they will ever change. And I won't change, either. So, if that is misbehaving—I will misbehave.

"But, to get back to Mr. Schary. This is a wonderful man. I have lived in Hollywood long enough to know that some reporters might tell the story about how I broke the cane over his desk, and then not tell the truth about what happened afterwards. And the net result of all this would be that Dore would think I am a louse, and I would be."

Yes, Mario Lanza would look like what he says—a louse—if the truth weren't told. The lack of (Continued on page 82)

Pessimists keep yelling, "It won't last." Tony and Janet don't believe them, but just the same...

THEY'RE SCARED STIFF!

By Jim Burton

No honeymoon yet! Picture work keeps interfering. Since their marriage Tony and Janet have been separated more than they've been together.

■ No matter what they tell you about Hollywood marriages, there's nothing like them anywhere. Every Hollywood marriage is jam-packed with danger right from the start. Gossip, jealousy, and business interference are constant threats to marital success, and too often these threats grow up into divorce suits.

No Hollywood newlyweds are more aware of this than Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis who, since their marriage, have spent more time away from each other than together.

Last summer, when they were married in Connecticut against studio advice, Janet had to fly back to California alone. Tony had to continue his personal appearance tour with Piper Laurie for The Prince Who Was A Thief.

"That was the start of our separation," Janet says, "and even though we're living together now, we hardly get to see each other. Every time we plan a honeymoon, Tony's studio says, 'Wait until you finish one more picture,' or mine says the same thing. We thought we'd go on a honeymoon in June just after we were married, but I had to go into a picture with Peter Lawford. When that one was over, Universal had a script ready for Tony.

"Since our marriage, neither of us has been free at the same time. We're supposed to go to Hawaii on a honeymoon this winter, but we're not counting on it. The only thing we can really count on are those darn rumors."

These rumors, and you've probably heard some of them, insist that (a) Janet is pregnant (b) Janet and Tony aren't getting along too well (c) Janet and Tony are both having studio trouble.

"The situation can change any time," Tony says, "but as of yesterday, Janet wasn't pregnant. How that story got started as far back as September, I don't (Continued on page 58)

"Pinch me," Debbie Reynolds cries, "I'm dreaming!" Now her sister-in-law tells why the fame, the fans, the fancy clothes have Debbie in a tizzy.

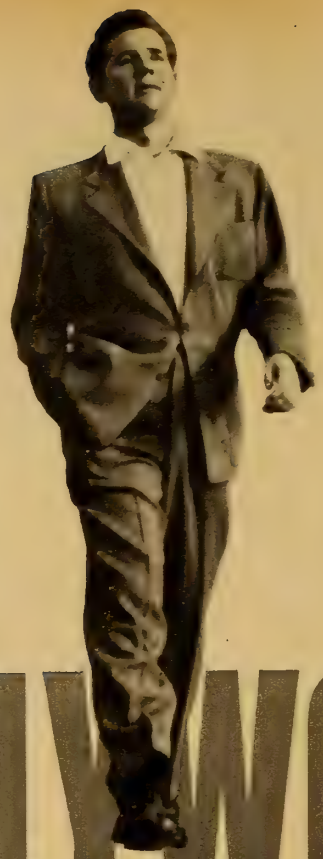
BY JOYCE REYNOLDS

Bless her little pointed head, you can't tell whether Debbie's trouble is love or hunger. Carleton Carpenter toted her to the Press Photographers' Ball.

Debbie can turn on glamor, too. For a gala premiere date with Robert Wagner, she dresses to the teeth in one of her fabulous collection of gowns.

■ Everybody who ever knew Debbie when she was Mary Frances Reynolds has been thrown for a loop. And that includes me. (I'm her sister-in-law). When I first knew her, in school a few years ago, she was considered just about the squarest square that ever hit John Burroughs High, mainly because she didn't date boys. In the minds of the crowd I ran around with, that simple fact added up to a parallelogram having four equal sides and four right angles.



Anybody who was anybody at J. B. High just automatically gathered of nights at Bob's Drive-In out in the valley, where we destroyed as many hamburgers as we could hold. And where was Debbie on these moonlit nights? Off somewhere with the Girl Scouts, or at home blowing into her French horn, or practicing how to twirl a baton. Heaven knows there were enough boys in the crowd who'd have been delighted to buy her a milkshake, but Debbie just wasn't interested.

She went out with boys, sure—to football games or school proms, something or anything to do with school activities—but parties were taboo. Don't ask me why. I guess that Debbie was so surrounded by a whirlpool of activity that (Continued on page 87)

HOLLYWOOD'S

■ Recently, several members of a national organization convening in Los Angeles were visiting the Clark Gable set at MGM. Mindful of the assistant director's cry of "Quiet, please!" they stood in silence, but their expressions, especially the women's, revealed their excitement as they watched the acting of one of the most fabulous men in show history. When the scene ended, Clark was excused for a short rest. As he started off for his dressing room every eye was on him. Walking steadily, his face set straight ahead, he came abreast of the group. They felt that surely he would turn his head and smile. But there was no pause in his stride. Without so much as a glance to acknowledge the admiration falling all about him, he kept right on and went by. In the cold hush of disbelief that followed, those who were left behind gazed at each other at a loss for words. They thought they had been deliberately snubbed. But they were wrong.

Clark had simply been ducking the one bugaboo almost all the stars come to dread—facing up in real life to their public. The strain of acting in the spotlight is not half as bad for them as living in it. Gable doesn't like it; Jennifer Jones and Rita Hayworth have been frightened by it; and performers like Janet Leigh, Peter Lawford and Howard Duff are never unaffected.

Go back to Greta Garbo. It wasn't her picture roles as a goddess that made her choose to be a recluse; it was having people expect her to act like one in her private life. Essentially the story is the same all the way up to the newest starlet, like Marilyn Monroe, for instance. Marilyn's beauty can fill the screen but not the painful pauses in her social conversations.

What is the nature of this bugaboo? Why does it affect the stars so strongly? The answer, bluntly, is that there are few stars (Continued on page 81)

the pig is in the parlor

■ Seated at the baby grand piano, Deborah Kerr was playing a soft accompaniment to her thoughts. She let the music trail off as she turned toward her husband.

"Tony," she said abruptly, "do you think it's true that a house reflects the owner's personality?"

"I suppose so," Tony answered, ready to agree with whatever his pregnant wife happened to say.

"Then," said Deborah conclusively, "I must have an awfully muddled personality."

Anthony C. Bartley III put down the TV script he'd been reading. He got up from his armchair and walked across the sun room to his wife who was studying their home with troubled eyes. He cupped her chin gently in one hand and turned her face towards his. "You're the most beautiful, muddled personality I know, and I love you." He underlined his opinion with a kiss.

Deborah placed her hands back on the keyboard to steady herself. "But about the house," she persisted. "Tell me the truth."

"I like it muddled, as you call it," Tony continued loyally. "It wouldn't seem like our home if it weren't for these fat old whale-oil lamps and that slightly battered marquetry table. Even the weird African heads seem like part of the family. And how would it look without that silly pig in the parlor? But if it makes you happy, you can turn the wine cellar into a skating rink, and plant cactus on the roof. Only one thing. No changes in my room, please."

Scotland's lovely gift to Metro giggled in spite of herself. "I didn't have anything quite so radical in mind. It's only my room whose personality I want to change."

"Go ahead, darling."

The changes Deborah Kerr outlined that evening were quite ambitious. They involved knocking out the south wall of her upstairs bedroom and replacing it with large picture windows. For a long time, she confided to Tony, she'd wanted to be able to lie in bed and (Continued on page 72)

The sunroom's arches echo the arches in the stucco exterior (left). Round-the-world furnishings include wooden heads from the Congo, whale-oil lamps from a London antique shop, and Italian plaques.

"The dining room was furnished tongue-in-cheek," Deborah grins. The table, supported by Prince of Wales feathers, was bought at auction. Gaudy blackamoor statues stand in indirectly lighted niches.

Deborah's bedroom was a complete re-make job. A wall was knocked out for the sea-scape picture window. This led to new draperies, re-upholstering, plastering and paper—all in all, a new "personality".

Tony Bartley's bedroom-study is crammed with RAF souvenirs like the portraits of his squadron. The focal point is a big TV set viewable from desk or daybed where he can check on [illegible] productions.

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

heartbreak ahead?

Her friends say Luft's not the type for Garland. But they can't stop Judy from throwing her heart away on the man she loves.

BY CAROLINE BROOKS

■ When Judy Garland returned to Hollywood after a five-month European tour during which she'd earned some $200,000, reporters at the train asked her how she felt.

For a minute, Judy wouldn't answer.

Her glance swept across the train station, and came to rest on her little daughter, five-year-old Liza Minnelli. Liza ran into her mother's arms. There was a joyful, kissing reunion, and only after that was over would Judy answer the eager press.

"I'm feeling great. I don't worry about my figure any more."

In England, Judy had been amazed by all the comment concerning her weight. Practically every newspaper describing her appearance at the Palladium, included such items as "a surprisingly heavyweight Judy Garland made her vaudeville debut last night," or, "Judy Garland, fatter and rounder than ever, arrived in London yesterday," or, "Never before has talented Judy weighed this much."

Talking about it later, Judy good naturedly said, "For a while they had me feeling like the fat lady from Barnum & Bailey. But they were really a wonderful audience. The crowds I played to in England were simply magnificent. So understanding. So warm. They bring out the best in an entertainer.

"He uses his fists too much," people say of Sid Luft, here with his lawyer (left). He answered four legal charges in October.

why autry can't quit

by Jack Wade

■ One day back in 1929 a young fellow from the Oklahoma cow country swung off a B. & O. coach on the Jersey side of the Hudson River and stood there gawking at the Manhattan skyline.

The yellow clay of the prairies still smudged his butterfly boots and an aroma of sagebrush wafted from his new suit of store clothes. He lugged a battered case that housed a five dollar, second-hand guitar.

A fellow passenger watched him stare at the silhouette of the Great City, and grinned. "Well, Bud," he asked, "what do you think of that?"

"My goodness!" drawled Gene Autry. "Once I get inside that place—how'll I ever get out?"

"Well," comforted the stranger, "a lot of people in there don't want to."

At that point, Gene had just ditched his railroad telegrapher's job, on Will Rogers' advice, to seek his fortune as a singing cowboy. By now Gene's five dollar guitar has been parlayed into a multimillion dollar career, and he's the busiest man, by far, in all of Hollywood. But sometimes the fabulous empire which he has built with his own brains, talent and luck seems as inescapable a labyrinth to Gene's friends as New York's canyons once looked to him.

Every now and then they ask him, "Gene, when you going to slow down and take it easy?" Or as his pal, Chill Wills, put it the other day, "Doggone, Gene, why don't you stop supporting all them Demmycrats back in Washington?"

At such times Gene grins the wide, white smile that has become famous wherever movies are shown, and astonishment shows in his mild blue eyes. "You mean quit?" he asks. "Why, honest, I wouldn't know how." And he's speaking the gospel truth. Even when he thinks he's taking it easy, Gene's about as passive as a Texas tornado.

YOU CAN'T PUT AN AMERICAN INSTITUTION LIKE GENE OUT TO PASTURE, AND TOURS LIKE THESE SHOW WHY.

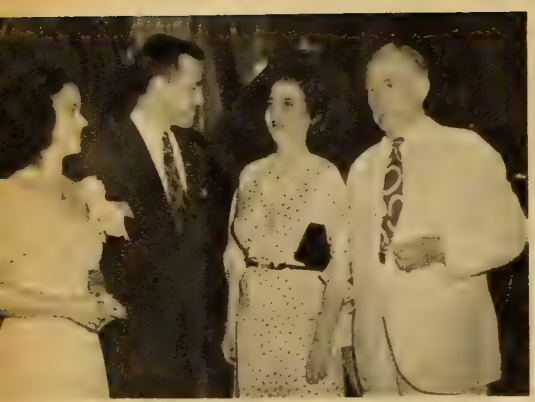
The thrill that comes once in a lifetime: Young Roger Ladage met Gene at the Illinois State Fair. He lost his family, but with Gene's help everything turned out all right.

Big smile for the grandstand: Gene spends weeks on tour. Here the fair officials in Springfield escort him to the stage where he appeared 20 years ago as a band singer.

A couple of Champions: Gene has played over 300 towns on tour and never missed a performance. Once he had to ride a freight car with the horses to keep a scheduled date.

Three out of 150: The Gene Autry enterprises have a payroll of over 150 employees, most of them long-termers. Here Rufe Davis and Ed Waller talk things over with the boss.

The best medicine yet: Gene never fails to visit the children's wards. In Springfield he also inspected some hospital equipment bought with funds from a benefit he did in the winter.



Backstage bedroom: Gene's often up from 6 AM to 3 AM. He keeps going by snatching cat naps backstage between shows. He's been promising himself a rest for 15 years.

To the millions who love her, MODERN SCREEN reports on how Shirley Temple is living "Happily ever after."

BY AGNES VAGHI

Mrs. Black; housewife

Washington's elite turned out for the reception given Shirley and Charles Black. Even Vice-President and Mrs. Alben Barkley were there.

Mrs. Parsons (center) hostessed the party which proved Shirley's place in Washington society is secure. (At right) Mrs. John Thomas.

Sophistication becomes Mrs. Black. She wore a new hair-do, sleek gown at the American Newspaper Women's Club party for servicemen.

■ Amidst world-tottering problems and talk of peace Shirley Temple moved to Washington, D. C., a few months ago.

"And only because my husband is stationed here with the Navy—specifically, in the Office of Naval Operations in case anybody wants to know." She added the last part teasingly over her unlisted telephone which is also a party line.

Shirley and her husband, Reserve Officer Lt. Comdr. Charles Black, are definitely not interested in publicity, even in the hot-news capital of the United States. After 20 years of movies, Shirley feels she's had enough.

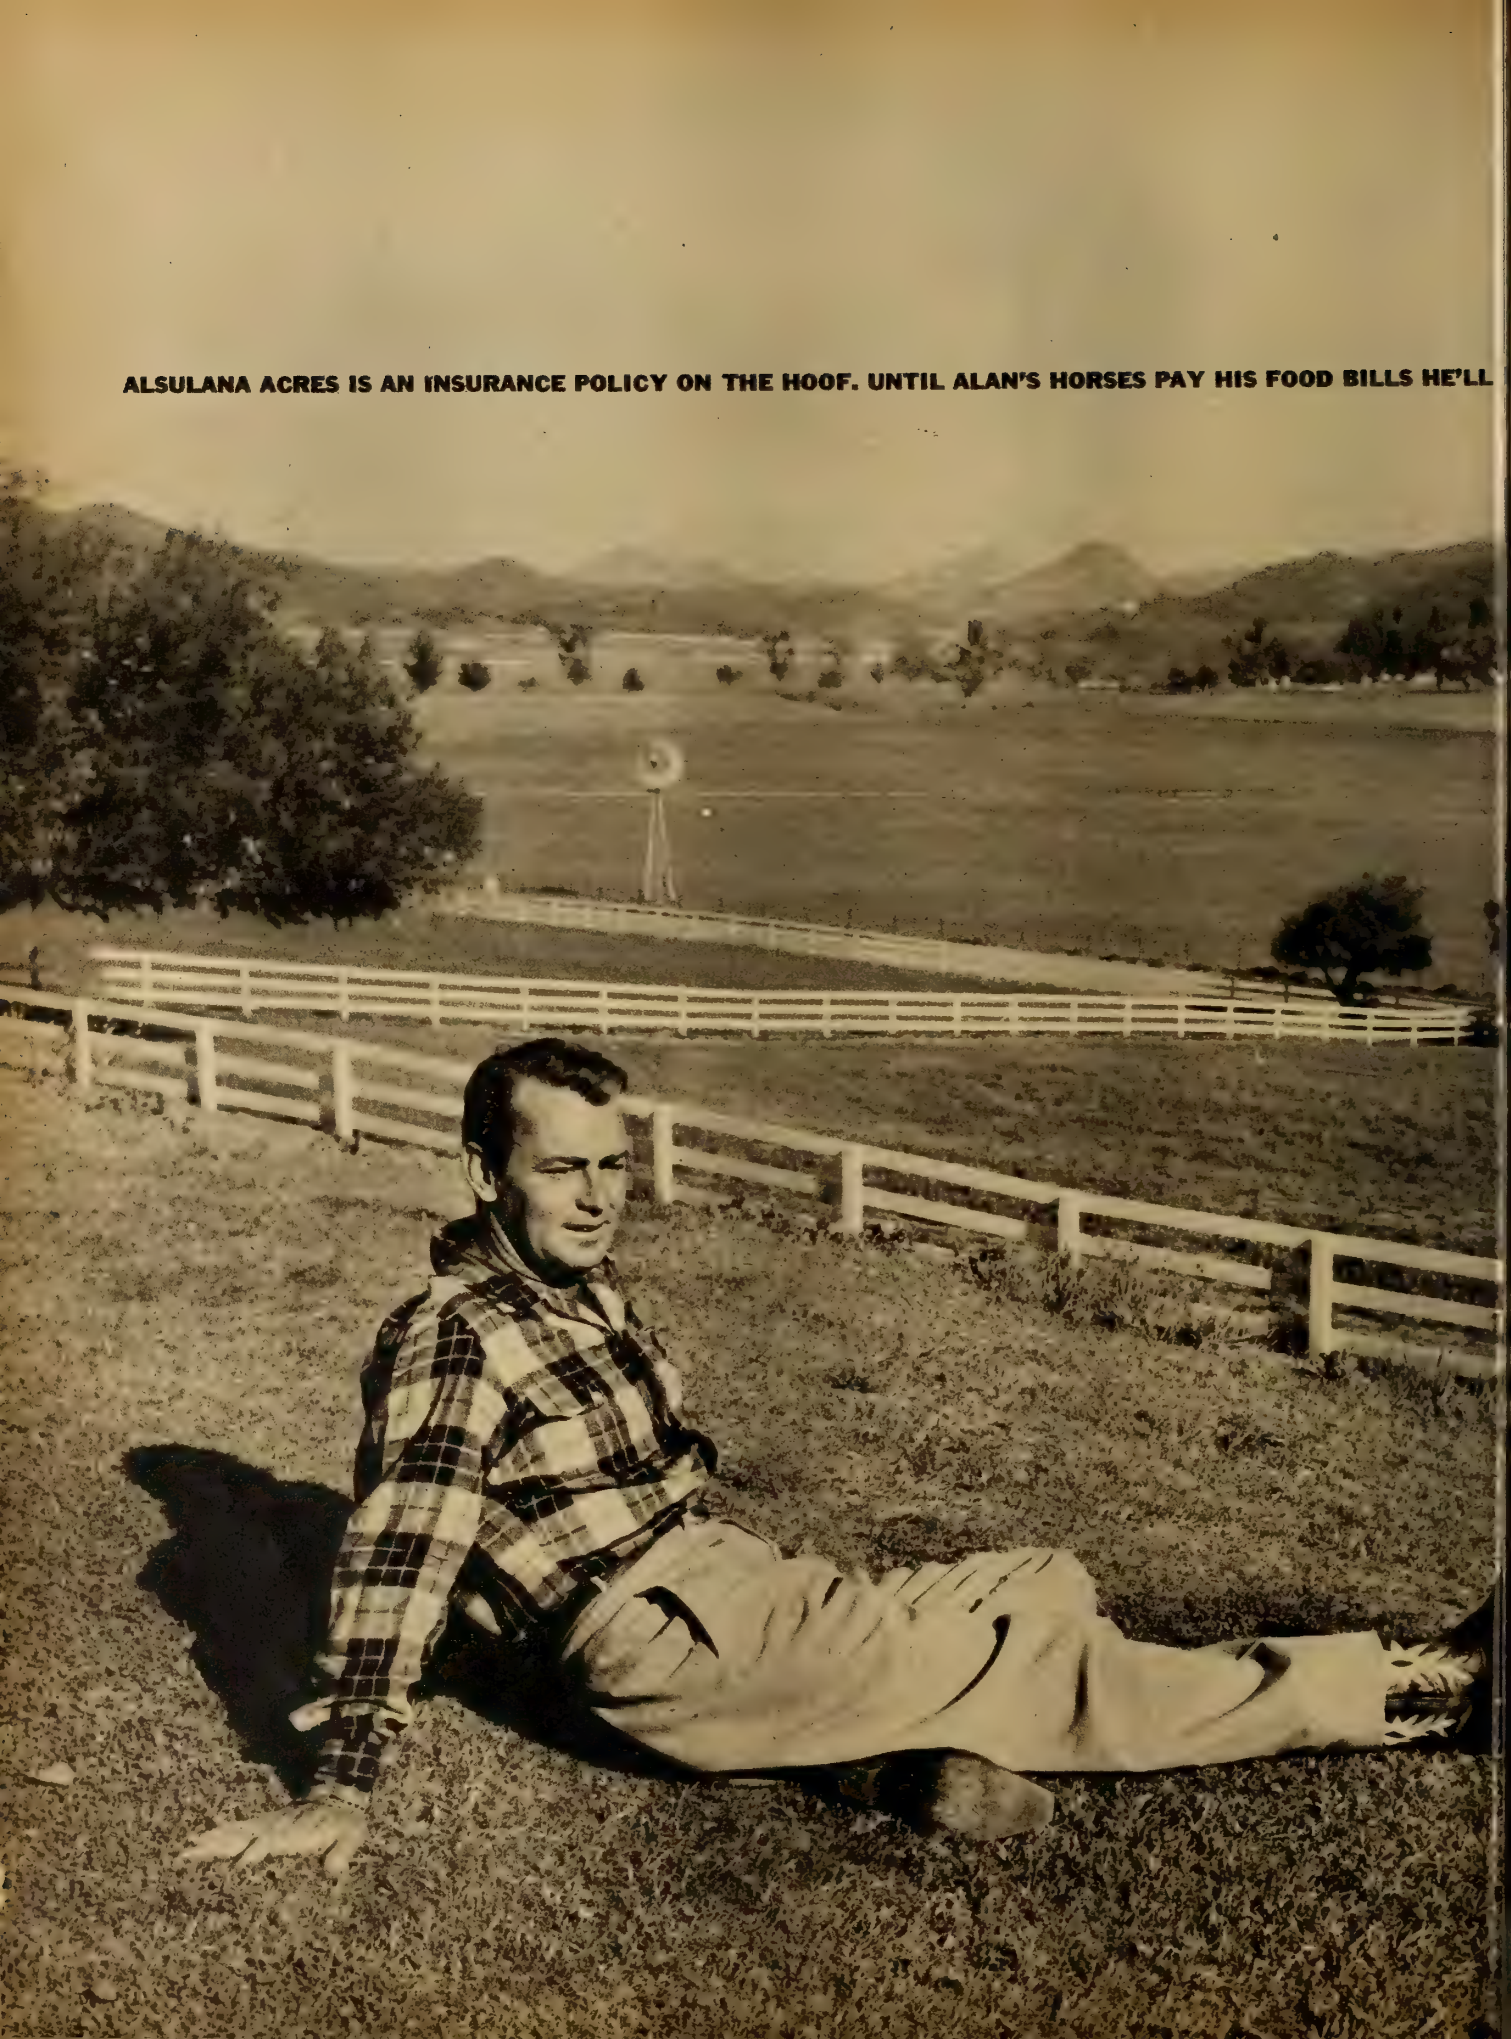
"I'm tired of telling interviewers how many pressure cookers I have, and posing for photographers in front of the fireplace reading the funnies," she says.

Instead, her ardent desire is to play a new role, that of being an unglamorous housewife, and mother to Linda Susan, her three-year-old daughter.

Linda Susan reminds everyone of Shirley when she was a child. Smart and "cute as a button," she's quite a conversationalist for her age. Now, there is a rumor that Shirley expects another baby.

Dressed in slacks or plain house cotton, Shirley takes charge of Linda herself, performing all the sundry chores of motherhood. In addition, she cooks for her husband, cleans house, and does the marketing without benefit of a staff of servants.

"Sure, it's a lot of work," admits Shirley, "but I love it."



Equaling her domestic abilities is her natural bent for business. Washington tradesmen are surprised to find Shirley a smart "cooky" when it comes to shopping. She always sees to it that she gets her money's worth.

"I'm Pennsylvania Dutch! I'm stubborn!" she says about the way she handles her new responsibilities.

But curiosity seekers, in a town supposedly conditioned to celebrities, are rampant, especially where Shirley is concerned. When she first came to Washington and put up in a furnished apartment, every newspaper in town heralded her arrival and hundreds of calls poured into the Navy Department. (Continued on page 62)

ALSULANA ACRES IS AN INSURANCE POLICY ON THE HOOF. UNTIL ALAN'S HORSES PAY HIS FOOD BILLS HE'LL

RANCH MAD LADD

FOOT THEIRS AND CASH IN ON THE FUN • By RICHARD DEXTER

photos by Joe Heppner

■ Hollywood is the land of the movie star and the fabulous salary, the home of glamor and the seat of wealth. To the rest of the world Hollywood life is all play with just enough work around to keep a man from growing stale. However, in actuality, it is the land of the high income tax, and it would surprise you to know the number of high salaried stars and executives who must have a sideline to protect them from the poorhouse in the days of their eventual retirement.

Take, for instance, the case of Alan Ladd and his famous ranch. It has been written about to a great extent and photographs of it have been printed in all sorts of magazines. A good many of the accounts of this "hobby" of Alan Ladd's have been pretty factual, but they all have neglected one important point. The Alan Ladd ranch is the family sideline, the venture they hope will one day keep them out of the poor house, if something should go wrong with the movie business. Or for some reason Alan should want to retire.

It must be admitted that ALSULANA ACRES, the name of the Ladd farm, began as a sort of a dream. Ever since Alan started in pictures, he had lived a quiet life in the city. He would sit at home in the evenings, and talk to Sue of one day being able to look out of their window at rolling hills, the likes of which they had seen on insurance company calendars. They both liked to ride and owned a couple of horses, which they rode on Sunday afternoons on the trails around the Los Angeles hills. At the first of each month, when the bills for the caring and feeding of these horses came in, they would soberly decide they must get rid of the animals as an unnecessary expense. This, of course, was in 1945 when Alan's (Continued on next page)

She's a dilly of a filly; the first foal to be bred on the Ladd's horse ranch. They raise thoroughbred stock for racing, with crops and cattle breeding on the side.

The boss gives morning instructions to his right hand man. Everybody works on the Ladd ranch. Alan does the big jobs; David and his sister have pint-size chores.

The ranch boasts pigs, too. Alan figures when he's too old to bring home the bacon it might as well be there waiting for him—in his own backyard.

This isn't labor trouble, it's fun. Good friends like Bill Demarest helped Alan fix up the place. He's turned a run-down farm, a ruined house, and crumbling stables into a show place.

"Remember, be gentle but firm." Daddy gives careful instructions to Alana and David before their daily morning ride. Both are fine horsemen.

The Ladds converted the old stables bit by bit into a handsome ranch-house which includes this kitchen, the center of their bustling family life.

Alan Ladd is a real friendly character. Off screen he's as helpful as your next door neighbor who comes over on Saturday afternoon to give a hand in raking up the leaves. So one day when a friend of his, an antique dealer in Beverly Hills, asked him if he would come along on a ride 45 miles up into the country and help unload a desk he had to deliver, Alan obligingly jumped into the truck.

When they arrived at the country estate, Alan and his friend lugged the desk into the house. The lady of the establishment, presuming that Alan was an assistant truck driver, asked him to wait outside in the yard while she concluded her business with the antique dealer. Alan walked around the grounds for a few minutes, breathed the fresh clean air, took a good look at the rolling hills and decided this was the life for him. Spotting a "For Sale" sign at some distance down the road, he walked over and took a look at the place. It was an abandoned ranch. There had been a house a number of years before, but it had burned to the ground and the stone foundations were almost entirely buried by dust and debris. There was a series of rickety stables set into the side of a hill and, except for a lone man tinkering with a decrepit windmill, not a creature in sight.

It was either Alan's good fortune or misfortune to approach the man and get into a conversation. At any rate, 15 minutes later, as he sat in the right hand seat of the truck headed back toward Hollywood, he owned an abandoned ranch with a burned down house and a half-a-dozen rickety stables set into the side of a hill.

Breaking the news to Sue was something of an ordeal, as Alan admits.

"I didn't know what to tell her," he said. "But on the ride home I suddenly had an idea. I not only would stable my two horses on my new property, I would (Continued on page 89)

"Not that we would mind. We want a family. That's one of the reasons we got married in the first place. I only hope that we have our honeymoon first, and Janet gets pregnant second."

Janet herself would like to have at least three children, and she says she's prepared to give up her career any time Tony wants her to. "Only we've talked it over," she adds, "and we both think it would be a good idea to wait and let Tony get established. After all, he's only been starred in three pictures, and in this business who knows which way the wind will blow? I'm only 23, and there's still lots of time for lots of babies."

The pregnancy rumors don't bother Tony and Janet nearly as much as the stories about their quarreling.

"I can honestly say," Janet insists, "that we haven't had a single quarrel since our marriage. We haven't had the time. When I was making Scaramouche, I had a six and seven o'clock call at the studio. Tony wasn't working at the time. I'd get up in the morning, prepare breakfast, have a cup of coffee for myself, and go off to work. At night, we'd go over and visit Tony's folks. Ever since his father suffered a heart attack, Tony's been very solicitous.

"How these stories about us fighting got started I really don't know. There's absolutely no truth to them. We're very happily married. All this stuff about our having career trouble, about Tony's resenting my career and my resenting his—honestly, that's just gossip."

TONY is equally disturbed about the stories. "Janet," he asserts, "is the perfect wife. What do people want from us, anyway? A scandal or something? We happen to be very happy. Is that so unbelievable? Unfortunately, we don't see each other as frequently as other newlyweds, but we'll work that out.

"People ask me how come we have a maid preparing our meals instead of Janet? That's simple. How can Janet do the shopping and cooking when she has to work at the studio? Janet knows how to cook, but at this point, it's more important for her to act than to make sandwiches for me.

"They're also saying that I resent the fact that Janet earns twice as much money as I do. Resent the fact? What am I, a lunatic? I hope she earns five times as much as I do. She deserves it. She's a great actress. Do you realize that Janet's made about 17 pictures in a little more than four years? Did you see her in Angels In The Outfield? She's getting better all the time. I want her to continue with her career. It's just beginning to roll."

To be perfectly truthful, Tony and Janet are so happy that they're scared stiff. It's difficult for them to realize that the success they're currently enjoying is the result of hard work combined with luck. They're inclined to believe that they owe practically everything to luck.

Ten years ago both of them were a couple of kids from the wrong side of the tracks.

Tony's father was a poor, kind-hearted, immigrant tailor who made just enough to keep his wife and two sons in food and clothes.

That Tony should now be earning $400-a-week seems almost impossible to his folks. Tony, though, has quickly adapted himself to the Hollywood standard of life. Today, he owns a Buick convertible, buys his clothes at Saks Fifth Avenue, employs a business manager to save money for him, lives in a Wilshire Boulevard apartment that rents for $200 a month, likes to eat in the best restaurants, and be seen at the swankiest night clubs.

Were Tony the typical case, he should have gone "Hollywood" a long time ago. That he hasn't is indicative of an unusual strength in his character. He has seen so many people shoved around during his lifetime that he treats everyone with respect and dignity. He cannot understand or abide snobbishness.

It is safe to say that the Hollywood press photographers consider him "the best" kid in Hollywood. Certainly, he's the most cooperative. As a matter of fact, Tony and Janet both owe a good deal of their current popularity to these photographers, which is why they will do practically anything to please them.

Tony himself has said over and over again, "I wouldn't be where I am today if it weren't for those photographers. They had me in one magazine after another long before I even got the lead in Prince. If there's anything Janet and I can do to help them, we certainly will."

Last September, the photographers of a national magazine were a little piqued because they'd been scooped on the Leigh-Curtis wedding pictures by their competitors.

"You tell us how we can make it up to you," Tony told the boys who'd been scooped.

Someone got the bright idea of shooting Janet and Tony down at Palm Springs, spending the night in sleeping bags, camping out, taking a mule trip up into the mountains, the regular Palm Springs layout. "It'll make a great winter issue," one of the photographers said.

The temperature at Palm Springs during September frequently hits 104 or 110. At the time the request was made, Tony and Janet were both working six days a week. There was also much talk that Janet would have to work on Sundays doing re-takes for Jet Pilot, a film which has been in production at RKO ever since 1949. Despite all this, the newlyweds gave up their one Sunday together and drove down to Palm Springs with the photographers. They slept in a sleeping bag, rode the mules into the mountains, posed all day for pictures.

When it was all done, they thanked the cameramen profusely. "It was sweet of you," Janet told them, "to do this layout for us."

And Janet meant it, too.

THERE are many actresses in Hollywood who will tell you that Janet Leigh is all sugar and scheme, that she has never thrown any bread upon the water without first making certain it would return as a three-layered chocolate cake.

These are the cats who are jealous of Janet's $800-a-week-salary, her amazing career, her happy marriage. They accuse her of deceit, affectation, and fraudulent emotional display.

They don't really know her.

Janet is a small-town girl who had just about as much as Tony—which is nothing—before she came to Hollywood. Her starting salary of $50-a-week seemed enormous to her. Today, five years later and despite all her expenses, $800-a-week seems enormous, only she knows that Van Johnson earns $5,000-a-week, Lana Turner $4,000, and that a newcomer like Betsy Von Furstenberg started off at Metro this year with $400-a-week.

However, the studio has given her several bonuses, and when her contract expires two years from now, there is little doubt that her agent, the Music Corporation of America, (Continued on page 58)

At the moment, her paramount interest is her marriage, which she insists is infinitely more valuable than her career.

Janet was married when she was 15, but the marriage was annulled, and she never lived with her husband.

She was married again when she was 18, this time to Stanley Reames, and she learned what Hollywood can do to a marriage when the wife is breadwinner, and the husband is a non-professional trying futilely to get ahead. She is convinced that present husband Tony will develop into one of the most talented young actors in the business. "In two or three years," she says, "I'll just be known as Tony's wife."

A basically shrewd young woman whose prattle occasionally fools people into believing her naive, Janet says this because she feels that in two or three years she will become a mother.

She feels that motherhood will not necessarily interfere with a career, and that after seven years of low-salaried apprenticeship, she would be silly to give up a profession just as she's about ready for the big-time brackets.

Right now, most of her efforts are concentrated on making Tony happy. She babies him constantly. Whenever he has the chance, she lets him sleep late, prepares breakfast, tiptoes out of the house. She lets him make all the decisions as to friends, dates, household expenses.

Having been married previously, Janet knows that a girl has to fight for her love and happiness, that it just doesn't happen; that marriage is a working partnership.

Fortunately for her, Tony is happy in his work. He wants to act constantly. Inactivity makes him restless. For a while there was talk at Universal of letting Audie Murphy play the role of the deaf-mute prizefighter in Hear No Evil. When Tony was finally given the part, he was ecstatic. He'd like to make five or six pictures a year. "I go crazy when I'm not working," he says. "My friends work all the time."

Tony is quick to say that Universal has been wonderful to him. "I love this studio. I love all the guys in it. You couldn't find a nicer bunch anywhere. When it comes to new deals and contracts, what do I know about that? I've got an agent. Let him do the worrying. All I want to do is work."

When asked if he's working at his marriage, Tony says, "Working at it? Listen, that's the greatest thing that ever happened to me. That Janet! You couldn't find a better wife. Anything I want to do, she wants to do. I want to see my folks, she wants to see them. I want to go down to the beach, she wants to go down to the beach. I like steak and potatoes for supper. She likes steak and potatoes. Any rumors about our being unhappy are strictly phony. We are the two happiest kids in California. All I can say is that everybody should have the trouble we're having. It would be a great world."

When a man thinks that his marriage is perfect through some divine intervention ("It just happened that way. Janet and I were meant for each other") you can rest assured that the wife in question is doing one sensational job.

The reason that Tony is so sublimely ecstatic these days is that there are no lengths to which Janet Leigh won't go to maintain their love.

"The advantage in having been married before," she says, "is that a girl learns."

Janet Leigh has learned plenty. To her the price of a happy marriage is eternal vigilance of the most subtle and unobtrusive sort. THE END

Are you in the know?

What's the correct way to wear a corsage?

- ☐ Stems up
- ☐ Stems down
- ☐ On the right shoulder

Is that an orchid—or an upside-down-cake? You don't put posies in a vase face down, so why pin them on with stems pointing skyward? Wear a corsage on the left shoulder; and remember . . . petals up! Being sure helps keep your confidence hitting on all 8 cylinders. Like trying all 3 absorbencies of Kotex. They're different sizes, for different days; and with whichever one you select, you're "sure"!

When your date doesn't show up, should you—

- ☐ Snub him henceforth
- ☐ Plan dark revenge
- ☐ Be debonair

Stood up, eh? Well, simmer down—at least until he's had a chance to explain. Next time you meet, be debonair: ask "How come?" re last Saturday eve. You may find he simply misunderstood about which night the shebang was to be. As for the "certain" dates marked on your calendar—you need never doubt, with Kotex. Just trust that special safety center: your extra protection against embarrassment.

Which togs make good sense for skiing?

- ☐ Free n' easy
- ☐ Fleecy woolens
- ☐ A fur-lined topcoat

If you've ever trudged up a ski slope, or tried to maneuver those "waxed slats"—you know better than to tog yourself like a fugitive from the Yukon! Ski clothes should be lightweight. Tailored free n' easy. You don't need bulk for problem-day protection, either. That's why Kotex has flat pressed ends . . . (not thick; not stubby). So there's not even a hint of revealing outlines when Kotex is the napkin you choose.

If invited to visit your fiancé at camp, who pays your way?

☐ Little ol' you ☐ Leave it to him ☐ Put the bee on Dad

Depends on your hero's financial status. And whether Mom says you can go. Is he loot-happy? Let him buy your round-trip ticket—(if he doesn't send it with the invitation tell him "no tick-ee, no trip-ee"). But, if his only income is a G.I.'s pay—better foot your own expenses. In any case, don't be travel-shy just because "that" day is due. Let Kotex keep you comfortable—with downy softness that holds its shape. For Kotex is made to stay soft while you wear it . . . to help you stay at ease!

What assures daintiness on problem days?

- ☐ Bath salts
- ☐ Powder
- ☐ Occasional showers

Takes more than daily tubbings to stay dainty at "that" time. So, smart gals sprinkle a powder deodorant on their sanitary napkins. Choose Quest powder! You'll find Quest best for napkin use, because, unlike most creams or liquids, this deodorant powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't slow up absorption. It's safe. Soothing. Unscented. Positively destroys odors. Buy a can of Quest deodorant powder today!

Have you tried Delsey?

Delsey is the new bathroom tissue that's safer because it's softer. A product as superior as Kotex . . . a tissue as soft and absorbent as Kleenex. (We think that's the nicest compliment there is.)

by joan evans

It's nice to be popular; but sometimes it's a trick to be popular—and "nice." Here's how to do it.

It seems hard to believe, but it was two years ago that the editor of Modern Screen was nice enough to ask me to conduct this column. I've loved doing it because I feel I've made a lot of new friends. My only regret was that I couldn't answer all the letters. I've had brickbats and I've had bouquets but—I'm thankful to say—the bouquets have really outnumbered the brickbats. And a letter like the one I received today from Mrs. J. S. of Mundelen, Ill., makes all the hard work I've put into the column pay off. She wrote, "You seem to be one of the most level-headed, best-adjusted teenagers ever to enter the movies. A lot of the credit must go to your parents, but a good deal is due you for putting their good advice to daily use."

But all good things must come to an end. Besides, I've found out that there are just so many teen-age problems, and then they begin repeating themselves. There is nothing so boring as repetition. I decided it was time to stop and I asked Mr. Saxon (the editor of Modern Screen) if I could. So with the following letters this is the end of "Tell It To Joan." 'Bye now, kids, and thanks for listening to me.

"Dear Joan: During the past three years I've had six leads in high school plays and for the last three summers I've done little theater work. We are moving to Los Angeles next June. Is there any chance for me in the movies?—J. B. Delaware, Ohio."

There's always a chance. About a million-to-one chance. The best thing for you to do is to find a good dramatic coach who can tell you if you have real talent or not. He (or she), if enthusiastic about you, can often interest an agent in your career. But beware of the many fake dramatic schools. Before settling on a dramatic school or a coach, be sure to talk to the successful people who have attended classes and find out if it's really and truly on the level.

"Dear Joan: I'm young for my age, and don't look as old as I really am. I'm the only child in the family. All my life I've been pampered and babied beyond description. I can't take responsibilities because they were never given me. I can't hold a job. I've been fired from three jobs in the past six months. I'm desperate.—M. M. Mason City, Iowa."

You're quite right when you say that at this moment you can't take responsibility. Your letter tells me that you can't even take the responsibility for your own mistakes. See what you are doing now? You're blaming your parents for your own shortcomings—shifting the responsibility to them. That's no good. You'll never be an adult until you change your attitude. And changing your attitude is just up to you. What's past is past. It might have been better if you had not been so pampered and babied—if you had been given responsibilities. But what you have to do now is learn fast. You've got to use your head, girl. You're certainly not going to be pampered and babied by a boss. Make your New Year's resolution now. Get a new job. Listen carefully to what you're told to do. If you can't remember, make a list of everything you're supposed to do and do it. But because you know you have a weakness you have to work harder than the next girl. You must do more than you're paid to do to prove capability.

"Dear Joan: I am 16 years old and come from a good family. I get A grades, belong to the school band, am a piano student and teacher (I have 15 pupils), cheerleader and active in church organizations. In spite of all of this, I have an inferiority complex. I can't even enjoy myself any more. What do you think is the matter with me? —M. S. Tower City, No. Dak."

Honey, I don't think you know what an inferiority complex is. It is impossible for you to be all these things and feel inferior. I think you're just so lucky that you've got to dream up something to be unhappy about, when you should be thanking heaven for your luck. If you could see the hundreds of letters I get from kids who want to be popular, you'd never feel sorry for yourself again. And thinking you have an inferiority complex is really just feeling sorry for yourself. In your case it's ridiculous. You're leading a good life with many advantages.

"Dear Joan: I've told my mother that I'd like to have a singing career. She's all for it, but she told me I'd have to overcome the stage fright I have. My friends, choir teacher, and high school orchestra leader, also told me I have a beautiful voice for singing.—E. A., Riverside, Calif."

Everybody who gets up in front of an audience to do anything has stage fright to a certain degree. It's normal and healthy. Why, when I did Peg O' My Heart in Hollywood this summer, I was ready to give the whole thing up before stepping out on that stage opening night. There in the wings I said to myself, "Joan, you're out of your mind. Whatever made you think you wanted to try to be an actress." But with me, the minute I step on the stage and speak my first line the stage fright goes. As a matter of fact, even a long-time professional like Helen Hayes has opening-night jitters. They all do. It depends on how bad it is. If you continue to be frightened while you're in front of the audience, and if your voice trembles or shakes or you lose control of it, then you must do something about it. But if it's that bad, I feel you'll get over it as you gain more confidence. The more sure you become of yourself and your voice technique, the more control you'll have. Also, just keep saying to yourself that it isn't too terribly important if you forget or hit a clinker. Singing is like playing competitive sports—you must be relaxed. Keep telling yourself that the people in front of you are all your friends, and besides, what could happen to you if you did not sing well? There's no law that sends people to the electric chair for hitting a flat note. And nobody can even put you in jail for it. So do the best you can, but remember the world won't come to an end if you fail.

"Dear Joan: I'm 13 and Mother and Dad won't let me go out with boys unless I take my brother or sister with me. When I tell the boys I have to take my brother or sister along, the boys don't want me to go. But Mother and Dad think I'm doing something wrong if they or my brother or sister are not with me.—V. E., Roseland, La."

You know, I'm a great believer in doing what the other kids do. But isn't 13 a little young to be dating boys alone? Now don't get me wrong—I don't mean with brother or sister along. But if a crowd goes out together, wouldn't that be okay with your Mother and Dad? And anyhow, a crowd is more fun. Ask them this, and then if they say okay, the next time a boy asks you for a date suggest that another couple or two go with you to the movies, or skating, or whatever you plan to do. I had my first date when I was 13, but it was to a big school dance that was well chaperoned. Afterwards, six of us went out together for food. I think this is the best way.

"Dear Joan: The girls at our school who are popular smoke, cuss, and sass everybody. We would like to be popular, but do not want to smoke or cuss.—B. L., Salinas, Calif."

Honestly, I could just shake those girls who think the way to be popular is to be wild. When you say "popular" I'm sure you mean popular with boys—for I know those girls aren't popular with girls. And I also know it is scant comfort to tell nice girls that the wild girls' popularity is built on something false and will not last—particularly while the nice girls sit at home. But that's the truth, honey, and I'm stuck with it. Boys pretend to like wild girls—and they do for a time. But they get fed up with them, and you just look around you at the older girls you know who are married. Men marry the nice girls. It seems unfair that when you're young the reward for being nice seems to be boy-less evenings. But even if you have to "smoke, cuss, and sass everybody" to be popular, would you want to? Isn't that a pretty big price to pay? For you wouldn't like yourself. And self respect is more important than popularity. Honestly, it is.

So that's it now. I'm putting the cover on my typewriter. And I'm not fooling when I say I'll miss you all.

mrs. black; housewife

(Continued from page 46) At first the name Black had no more meaning than Smith or Jones to the department clerk who accommodatingly thumbed through records to find the exact whereabouts of this officer. Then, like the sun bursting through the clouds, it dawned on her that this was Shirley Temple's husband.

Growing weary and listless, her voice on the Navy end of the wire took on a new tenor: "Do you mean Shirley Temple's husband? I'm sorry! He's not on active duty. We haven't the slightest idea where he is."

THE Blacks soon left their Wyoming Avenue apartment, for Shirley wanted more sunshine and picture windows. A real estate office was contacted and Shirley told them exactly what she wanted. She was looking for a modern house, well built with spacious rooms, at least three baths, and situated in open country free of trees.

The first house Shirley became interested in was a two-story Cape Cod located outside of Bethesda. The little girl who lived next door was all agog at the prospect of having a glamorous movie star for a neighbor. She planned to be sitting nonchalantly on the steps of the new house when Shirley Temple Black came to inspect it.

"Are you going to buy this house?" she asked Shirley, innocently, at inspection time.

"I don't think so," said Shirley. "It's too small."

Dejectedly, the girl told some of her teen-age friends about the interview: "It's plenty big, and it does have four bedrooms."

The Blacks settled for a rambler in Potomac, Maryland, with a stable thrown in for good measure. Every house in this area boasts a stable and a white fence serving as a corral. Though they have no horses yet, they own two dogs, a boxer and a great dane.

The house cost $48,000, is H-shaped in design, and is situated on four acres of land. There are seven rooms, three baths, no basement. However, the stable loft affords plenty of storage space.

And Shirley has her picture windows—two of them. One is in the study looking onto a flagstone patio in the back of the house; the other faces the front from the living room. Their furniture was shipped to them from California.

Potomac might best be described as a fashionable community approximately 15 miles from the White House, inhabited by horse lovers who actually ride to the foxes, and entertain British-style before a horse show. On these estates, the horses usually graze in the front yards.

Shirley's neighbors are mostly business people, who spend a great deal of time being sociable. They've taken her into their set wholeheartedly, and go out of their way to shelter her from the never-ending ogling. The general opinion of the Blacks is:

"They are the nicest couple . . . and very simple. Nothing pretentious about them. Too bad they can't be left alone."

The neighbors' children, though, are excited over the unusual notoriety lately come to their back yard.

One day, a group of them asked Shirley for autographs. Graciously, she complied and signed: "Mrs. Charles Black." One disappointed child moaned, "But this isn't worth anything!"

Recently, a padlock was attached to the gate which leads into Shirley's driveway. This was done to keep out Sunday visitors who have been known to drive onto the property. Some of them would bring gifts of home-grown apples, while others just tried to catch a glimpse of Shirley. It seems that it will be a while before people forget her legendary past.

Even when she decided to become a member of the Congressional Country Club, which is a short distance from her home, she couldn't escape the crowds. One afternoon she drove out to the Club with her daughter for a look at the place, and people seemed to materialize out of nowhere to mill about them.

The Blacks' social life in Washington, where any excuse is good enough for a party, has had plenty of glamor in it.

An elaborate reception was given in honor of the Blacks this summer by Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Morgan Parsons. Mr. Parsons is Vice President of the U. S. Steel Corp. Among high ranking guests were the Vice President and Mrs. Alben Barkley, Mrs. Brannan, wife of the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of Commerce and Mrs. Charles Sawyer, Dr. John R. Steelman and Mrs. Steelman, Chief of the Economic Stabilization Agency and Mrs. Eric Johnston, and many other high officials in government and diplomatic circles. Curiosity about Shirley was more restrained here. But, even so, she stole the show from political bigwigs.

SHORTLY after they moved into their Maryland home, their immediate neighbors, the Sam Bogleys, and the de Francheaux (both in the real estate business) threw a welcoming party for them.

Shirley had such a good time that when Mr. Bogley told her he was planning a trip to the west coast, she wanted to give him a letter of introduction to her mother. When Mr. Bogley gets to Hollywood, Shirley's mother intends to give him a party.

In the middle of August, Shirley attended another large affair. The American Newspaper Women's Club entertained service men at the palatial home of H. Grady Gore, which overlooks the Potomac River. Mr. Gore, owner of a fashionable hotel on Massachusetts Avenue, has announced his intention to run against Maryland's Senator Butler next election.

At this party Shirley's appearance was more sophisticated than usual. She wore a decolleté gown and her coiffure was tightly dressed off the face. She came out onto the lawn and gaily sat to be photographed with service men.

Perhaps, one day the Blacks will be able to lead a more normal family life as private citizens and constituents of Maryland—at least until Shirley is ready to come out of retirement. Meanwhile, being in the limelight in Washington has its compensations, and Shirley seems to be thriving on it.

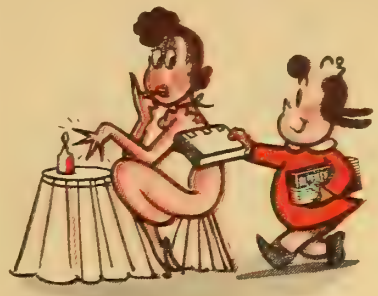
By nine o'clock Gene was in Colorado Springs, by 9:30 he was em-ceeing a rodeo, at 10:30 he took in a reception at the Broadmoor Hotel, and at 2:30 in the morning he took off in his plane for Springfield, Illinois, arriving at six o'clock in the dawn. Ten o'clock that morning he led a parade opening the Illinois State Fair, and at noon visited a hospital. At one o'clock he rehearsed a show for the Fair and at eight that night staged it. The next morning he rehearsed his "Melody Ranch" radio program and put it on, smooth as silk as usual, at seven that night. Then Gene flew back home to Hollywood.

When he got there his wife, Ina, who ought to know better by now, posed him the familiar query. "Gene," she said, "when are you going to relax?"

"Why right now, honey," came back her hustling husband. "Haven't got a thing in the world to do all week. Is that the telephone?"

Multiply that hectic hitch of time by around 52 and you have a fair picture of a year in Gene Autry's life. Gene makes six feature westerns a year, two TV shows a week, 52 radio performances, and cuts 32 sides of Columbia records. Last year he toured 67 towns in these United States and played before 600,000 people in 71 days. His annual Madison Square Rodeo show ran five weeks in New York and two in Boston. In between, Autry hopped around the country by air looking over oil wells and ranch property, and other business interests. All in all, he traveled 100,000 miles. And that's his year-in-year-out program.

Why does he do it? What makes Autry run and keep running? You have to know how Gene's made to answer that, and something about the streaks of gratitude, loyalty, and humanity that run through his six-foot frame.



Gene Autry isn't chasing more money, more honors or more fame. He has enough of all three to last a couple of lifetimes. Gene has no idea how much he's worth, but it's probably around $4,000,000. Each year he collects close to $1,500,000, of which 90 per cent goes to Uncle Sam. He's always had a golden touch that makes King Midas look like a piker. Gene bought a sandy 5-acres in Burbank once for his horses, paid $10,000 for it, and all his pals agreed sadly he'd been stung. He sold it for $25,000 when the city condemned it for a park. When Gene began looking into oil wells with Dick Powell and John Wayne not long ago, he joined up with Douglas Johnson, a Texas wildcatting wizard who had hit 57 times out of 61 tries. Some of those hits were Gene's.

He's a natural business man (Gene has no business manager) and so far he hasn't missed. Gene has real estate in the San Fernando Valley leased by chain drug stores. He has three big paid-up insurance policies. He has an interest in 130,000 acres of ranch land, scattered ground in Oklahoma, Texas, and Arizona. He has his Melody Ranch and his Laurel Canyon hacienda, two radio stations, in Phoenix and Tuscon, and even a western haberdashery at Phoenix called "Gene Autry's Branding Iron." In short—as a cowpoke pal of his says, "They won't be playing no benefits for Gene."

As for fame—Gene's the first cowboy star ever to land in Hollywood's Big Box-Office Ten (he was 8th, 6th and 4th). He captains the oldest, biggest and most active Hollywood star fan club (over 50,000 members); he's a colonel on the staff of a dozen states and a while back, 50,000 school teachers in Oklahoma signed a petition for him to run for U. S. Senator. He's had firm friends among the great—all the way from President Roosevelt to Dizzy Dean. As one Hollywood critic recently put it, "Gene Autry is a national institution." That's getting closer to the real reason why Gene will be carrying on for a long, long time to come. There are too many people who'd miss him—and miss him badly—if he ever quit.

PROBABLY the biggest disappointment of Gene's life is that he has no kids running around his house. But if he felt like it he could say, "I've raised a million of 'em," and he wouldn't be stretching the truth very far.

There are boys everywhere named after Gene, some of them with deep voices now and sprouting whiskers, who shake Gene's hand and tell him what he's meant to their boyhoods. There are sick and crippled kids, too, in all corners of the land who've had their shut-in lives brightened by Gene. In every town he plays he makes it a point to visit the local children's hospital, and what he sees in the delighted eyes of the kids there is his reward.

Last year in Lincoln, Nebraska, Gene hosted the entire population of Father Flanagan's Boystown—600 kids—at his show, the first time they'd ever left the place as a group. This year Gene decided to turn his Melody Ranch into a resort for underprivileged boys. When Gene came back from the war the biggest worry on his mind was kids. "Why just think," he puckered, "there are kids four years old by now who've never heard of Gene Autry!" That's why he sank over a million dollars in his rodeo tours—to meet this new generation of kids in person. Doing that, Gene Autry has collected some memories he wouldn't sell for all the box-office gold he's collected so far.

There was the little girl in Youngstown, Ohio, for instance. Sally Sue was her name and she loved horses, especially Prince, her own. But she couldn't ride him any longer. She had leukemia. All she talked about was Gene Autry and—oh—if she could only see him! All she lived for was the moment when Gene came to town.

They told Gene about Sally the minute he arrived. He had two performances to play, one right after the other and not a minute to spare, but he went right out to her house. Outside the window Prince whinnied as they talked. "Isn't he a nice horse?" begged the little girl. "Why, honey," said Gene, "he's the finest horse I ever saw. He's better than Champ!"

"I'll ride him again—won't I, Gene?"

"Sure you will," Gene lied.

He stayed there an hour while the show crowd waited. Then when she slept he tiptoed out. It was Sally Sue's last big thrill. She died soon after.

And there was the little girl in Belleflower, California, close to Hollywood, whom the doctors said didn't have a chance to live. Something malignant, they said, was wasting her away. When Gene went to her house he found her bedroom literally papered with his pictures—over 500 covered the wall. Gene didn't do much—there isn't much even a movie star can do. He sang some songs, left her an album of records, told her stories, told her to get well.

And miraculously, she did get well. Today she's 15, healthy and pretty, and she never misses coming to Gene's broadcasts when he's in town.

Gene realizes his role as a kid's hero and he won't be walking out on the children who worship him—even the ones who sometimes take him for a ride, like the girl who swiped his boots one night in a Pullman when he left them for the porter to shine. They're all a big family of his, they've written him as many as 108,000 letters in one month. And they're a family he'd hate mighty bad to desert.

AND there's another family Gene Autry has, a family of grown-ups with families and kids of their own. They're the people who long ago hitched their wagons to Gene's star. Gene repays loyalty with loyalty; that's his style. Today over 150 of Gene's professional pals get weekly checks signed, "Gene Autry." Thousands more indirectly have their fortunes linked with Gene's. One whole town in Ohio, for instance, works at making Gene Autry cap pistols. At Christmas, Gene has to give two parties for 80-odd guests each, to crowd all his closely knit gang into his house. No other Hollywood star has half as many close show business associates, or ones of such long standing.

Armand "Mandy" Schaefer, for instance, who produces Gene's pictures, has been doing that for 16 years. Frankie Marvin, one of his guitar players, has plunked accompaniment to Gene's songs for 17.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

On a pleasure trip to California I decided to go stand on the famous corner of Hollywood and Vine Streets just to see if anything happened. While standing there, an Englishman and his wife came up alongside of me. They were obviously enjoying the sights.

All of a sudden, the man burst out, "Why, Aunt Louise, what are you doing here?"

The person he had spoken to turned around and it was Ginger Rogers.

The Englishman was seized with embarrassment and began to apologize.

Miss Rogers said, "Don't apologize. I'd rather be remembered by the name 'Aunt Louise' than 'Ginger Rogers.'"

Mrs. E. R. Hechter
Clifton, N. J.

Carl Cotner, his musical director, has 15 service stripes. Johnny Bond, another guitarist, 11; Johnny Agee, his horse trainer, 13—and that's how it goes.

Sometimes Gene kids them, "How can I ever quit? I'd have to get all you guys jobs!" As for the guys—they wouldn't work for anybody else. By now they're Gene Autry men—they'd fight you if you knocked their boss—and in the competitive world of Hollywood that's something rare and refreshing.

Of course, one of the biggest and best reasons why Gene hasn't really a remote thought about hanging up his well worn spurs, or even letting them cool off, is that he loves what he's doing and thrives on it, too. "If they put me out to pasture," he says, "they might as well sell me for glue. I'd fall apart pronto."

In spite of his man-killing schedule, Gene, who is in his early 40's, keeps the tensile, indestructible physique of a young buckaroo. Each year he trots dutifully to his doctor for a complete physical checkup. After the examination the doc growls disgustedly, "Now beat it, Gene, and don't bother me. They'll have to shoot you to get rid of you, I guess. You've got the arteries of a young government-inspected bull."

Ina, Gene's wife, is a devout and practicing Christian Scientist. Gene's not, officially, but he's caught a lot of the sunny, affirmative outlook on life from his marriage partner in the 19 years they've been together. Maybe that's why Gene has small patience with anyone who bogs down with the petty miseries of mortal men. When you're around Autry, you'd better keep on your feet, like he is, or chances are he'll yank you upright fast.

Last year, for instance, one of Gene's gang, traveling with him through the South, got bogged down behind him with a bad cold in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Knowing Gene, he just rose above his aching bones and ploughed his car through the rain to catch up. But halfway over to Dallas, Texas, it skidded and he gashed his arm. That really landed him in a local bed and he called Autry, told him his woes. "Drive with the other arm," said Gene, "but get here." He did.

Gene's not a flintheart—on the contrary—but he feels so aces all the time himself, that he can't imagine anyone else having a pain. And Gene admits he bears a charmed life.

Only the other day, making his latest picture, Valley of Fire, Gene was out in Newhall on the long straight stretch of track where many a Hollywood thriller has been filmed. The script called for Autry to race Champ alongside a highballing freight and swing aboard. There was nothing new about that stunt for Gene. Only he's a pretty valuable hunk of man to risk on a dangerous scene which stunt men have handled for Western stars since the days of Tom Mix. Sandy Sanders, Gene's stunt expert, stepped up to mount Champ but Gene waved him back. "Take it easy," he said. "I could do this with one hand tied behind me."

It might as well have been tied, because Gene missed the grips and tumbled down in the cinders by the grinding wheels. That's a very nice way to make hamburger out of yourself, but, of course, Autry rolled clear. Then—cussing just a little bit—he got up and did it right. Professional daredevils have been killed for doing less—and in Hollywood, too.

Gene has been flying his own plane ever since he earned his wings at Luke Field back in 1942 during the war, and seasoned them flying bombers across the dangerous "Hump" above Burma in the Air Transport Command. By now he has 3500 officially logged hours in the air and hundreds more not down in the book. After the war he bought a surplus P-38 fighter—a plenty hot plane to handle. But in that and his favorite Beechcraft, which he flies today, he's never had a real crack-up. The closest shave came only a few weeks ago. Hopping back to Hollywood from the East, Gene sat down in Las Vegas, Nevada, to refuel. Taking off at 95 miles per hour, his landing gear pulled up too soon, the crate skidded 200 yards and ended up on its nose.

How Autry has stayed all in one piece mystifies even his closest pals, plenty of whom will fly with Gene anywhere but decline politely to sit beside Autry when he's at the wheel of any one of his four Cadillacs. In fact, the only person who rests easy with Gene in the driver's seat is his trusting wife, Ina. She used to push the floor boards nervously, too, but now Ina laughs, "I can ride with Gene and at the same time put up my hair." It's not that he's reckless, but just that he herds his buggy like a cow pony cutting out steers, with a sure touch but a hairline fender margin. "When I go somewhere," explains Gene simply, "I like to get there."

This driving, cannonball urge of Gene's is directed just one way—straight ahead.

That's why he could never stop and rest on his laurels. They'd just make him itch. "What Gene's done doesn't mean beans to him," drawls Frankie Marvin, the guitar player who's been with him 17 years. "It's what he's doing and gonna do that counts."

The past is always a dead duck the way Gene's mind ticks, and I can't think of a better way to prove that than what happened when Gene's house burned back in 1941. Gene was East with Ina at the time, and his old friend, Bev Barnett, was slated to fly to meet him that morning with some important contracts.

Between the time Bev left home to drive past Gene's empty house, it caught fire, burned in 20 minutes with everything in it—including the contracts. Bev took a look at the ashes, and rushed to a phone.

"Say," he was greeted, "why aren't you on that plane?"

Bev let him have it. "Gene," he said, "I hate to tell you this—but your house just burned. Nobody hurt, but everything in it's gone."

"Well, come on," he got back.

"I guess you didn't hear me, Gene," repeated Bev, saying it slower. "I said your house just burned down to the ground!"

This time there was an impatient snort. "Well, you said it burned. So it's burned. Get going now. We've got business here." That's a typical Gene Autry reaction to any news, good or bad. He doesn't want to know what's happened, but what's coming up, and he's right on the ball with that.

In fact, the way things look now, Gene won't ever have that vacation he's been talking about for the past 15 years.

Like most stars, Gene pretends to play golf. He belongs to Lakeside, polishes a fancy set of clubs at home. He gets time to play maybe once a year. This year somebody promoted a charity contest between Gene and Roy Rogers. Gene got a terrific bang out of the fact that he won. But the scores were nothing to give Ben Hogan a scare. Gene shot 102 and Roy 105. A quick game of bridge or canasta is really Autry's only frivolity.

Right now, instead of pulling in his horns, Gene's expanding. He has just bought a half block on Sunset Boulevard where a big super market sat. He's remodeling it into 24 offices, and putting up a sound stage on the parking lot. He'll bring his TV operations there, his music publishing firm (yep, he still writes hit songs, too), his own offices, and several other Autry enterprises. And he'll be busier than ever, if that's possible, which is to say he'll be happier than ever, if possible.

"Guess I'll be around as long as the folks'll have me," he grins.

"You'll be around, you mean," his pal, Chill Wills, snorts, "until they sharpen yore heels and stake you down!"

That time looks like a far spell away. Hollywood hasn't softened Gene Autry up. Last fall Gene dropped in a Broadway café after his Garden rodeo show. Some toughs started boobing his Stetson and high heels and slamming "Hollywood cowboys" in general. Gene rose above that; he's learned to take it. But as he turned to leave, one of them shoved him. Gene whirled, measured the guy, and let him have one. Just one—but that did it. Then he walked out.

So it looks as if Chill Wills had something there. After 16 years as top hand in Hollywood's cowboy corral, there are absolutely no signs yet of Gene Autry's greasing his guns or slinging his saddle up on the rack. As for the fast-bucking, hell-for-leather pace he sets for himself—Gene has a ready answer for that:

"If it was easy," he grins, "everybody'd be doin' it!"

my predictions for 1952

(Continued from page 23) Will we have a divorce as startling, as unnecessary, as upsetting as that of Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor? Or a marriage as deliciously happy as that of Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis? Will we have another comedy team as funny as those money-making zanies, Martin and Lewis? Will we have two such inexplicable, heartbreaking tragedies as the deaths of Robert Walker and Maria Montez?

I remember interviewing Maria the last time she was in Hollywood. She was full of astrology, and assured me that her interest in it was not a pose. She had infinite faith in her celestial calculations.

"Hedda," she said with a gay laugh when I teased her, "I have made a careful study of the matter, and I have come up with a firm prediction: For myself a great future."

THERE are 12 months to go, 12 months of love, life, and the pursuit of careers in the most publicized city in the world. So much can happen. Who will be our new stars? Will handsome Dale Robertson be given more and more of the Ty Power parts at 20th Century-Fox? Will talented Mitzi Gaynor take over where Betty Grable leaves off? Will 1952 be the year that the one and only Garbo chooses to return to the screen and stop wearing her hair like a floor mop? Will the public forgive Rex Harrison who is making his first Hollywood film since Carole Landis' suicide? Will they forgive John Agar as they did Bob Mitchum? Will they forgive young Dick Contino as they did Tony Martin during World War II?

There are so many excellent, unforgettable pictures in 1951. Who'll be the lucky stars to capture that ever desirable Oscar come March, 1952?

Well, my crystal ball is shining like a marquee on opening night. And here's how it looks to me:

Good old wedding bells seem to be waiting to ring for Judy Garland in the spring of 1952, but I predict she'll fall out of love six months later. Sid Luft's divorce from Lynn Bari is final in January, and Judy's divorce from Vincente Minnelli is final in March. When I saw Judy recently in Hollywood, before she took off for her stint at the Palace in New York, she was full of the old bounce, or more poetically, the joy of living. The neuroses that had clung to her like poor relatives the past three years had disappeared entirely. Metro, the studio that fired her in 1950 after 15 years on the lot, suddenly decided to pitch in and do everything possible to make Judy's appearance at the Palace a success. They gave her clothes, songs, props, arrangements, and even a couple of directors, Bob Alton and Chuck Walters. In fact, they gave her everything except a contract.

When an actress is happy in her career, it usually follows that she is happy in her love life. So, Sid Luft, who has been her boy friend and personal manager for some months now, couldn't find a more propitious time to lead her to the altar. I must say that I would have preferred that Judy reconcile with her director husband, Vincente Minnelli, a really sweet guy who was wonderful to Judy when she got herself into such a neurotic mess, and who is just as devoted as she is to their cute little daughter, Liza. And, judging from the letters I have received, her fans would like her to reconcile with her husband. If the marriage to Sid Luft is to last, Sid had better do something about his mania for hitting people, especially people who wear glasses. So should Judy. It just ain't done!

I have never seen this town so surprised, and visibly shaken as when a tearful Barbara Stanwyck announced that she and Bob were getting a divorce—after 12 years of being acclaimed one of Hollywood's most ideal couples. Frankly, I think it even came as a blow to Barbara. When she appeared before the Superior Court of Los Angeles in February, Barbara said, "He asked me for a divorce. He said he had enjoyed his freedom while in Italy and wanted to continue to do as he pleased. I was greatly shocked and became so ill that I had to place myself under the care of a physician."

"That will be sufficient," said Judge Clark, and the divorce was granted. If Barbara hadn't been such a straight-shooter I think that the divorce could have been avoided. She could have said, "All right, Bob. So you had fun in Italy. So you had a girl friend. But divorce is a serious thing. Let's wait six months and see how we feel."

Six months after the divorce, Bob was ready to call off the whole thing. Freedom, he discovered, wasn't all it was cracked up to be. He had a few Hollywood dates, but they seemed to bore him considerably. He found out that it wasn't so much fun going off on a hunting trip, or flying his precious plane into the wild blue yonder, if there weren't Barbara and a home to come back to. While on location with the Ivanhoe company in England Bob didn't have a single date. "Hedda," he said over the phone to me when he landed in New York, "for three weeks I had dinner every night in my room—alone. Thank you for denying that I was dating Joan Fontaine." Will Barbara get that old pride bristling and refuse to take him back? I don't think so. She loves the guy too much. When I asked her recently if there would be a reconciliation she said, "Honestly, I don't know, Hedda. But I can tell you I've had some beautiful letters from Bob while he was away." I hope my crystal ball isn't letting me in for some wishful thinking.

Wish I'd Said That: Jackie Gleason to Frank Sinatra: "I'm glad you shaved off your mustache. It was making you round-shouldered."
Earl Wilson in The New York Post

By the time this is published I predict that Frankie will have made Ava the second Mrs. Sinatra. How long this marriage will last I can't say, but I do predict that their marriage will be as quiet as their courtship, which was as quiet as a boiler factory. Sometimes, stars who have a turbulent courtship settle down and are ideally married for the rest of their lives. But that is not the usual case. Ava is a calm, relaxed, comfortable sort of girl who likes people and wants people to like her. Frankie is a little spitfire, with a chip on his shoulder as big as the Empire State Building. He doesn't like people, especially people who peck typewriters, and his feuds and fights with the press have become very embarrassing to Ava. Several years ago, when they were a steady twosome, I wanted Ava to marry Howard Duff. But Ava says of Howard, "He was a friend." Well, anyway, Ida Lupino's got him now—lucky Ida, and lucky Howard.

The last time I talked to Ava when she stopped by my office, she assured me again that she had nothing to do with the Sinatra breakup. That's true. But it was Ava who brought the climax when she told Frankie she would not see him again as long as he was another woman's husband. With Ava it's marriage or nothing.

"Hedda," she told me that day, "I want to settle down and have babies. Honest."

"Ava, my girl," I said, "I like you. But I will believe that when I see it."

Mitzi Gaynor is fast becoming one of Hollywood's big time stars. They smile when they say "Gaynor" over on the 20th Century-Fox lot, just as they did 25 years ago when Janet Gaynor was bringing in millions at the box office. Mitzi is a lovely girl, level-headed, and talented. I am delighted that I can predict a beautiful and happy marriage for her next September. Why September? Because on September 4, Mitzi will be 21, and after that she is free to marry. Several years ago Mitzi fell in love with a young Los Angeles attorney, named Richard Coyle, a fraternity brother of Edward Everett Horton's, who introduced them backstage one night. Mitzi was all for dragging her ideal man to the altar at once, but her mother, a very wise woman, asked her to wait until she was 21; and Mitzi, a very wise daughter, promised. At the moment I believe that the Jane Powell-Geary Steffan marriage is the most perfect of the "younger set" in Hollywood, but come September, Jane and Geary will have to share their enviable spot with Mitzi and Richard.

DID you think, by any chance, that Clark Gable was surly and lonely while he was in Nevada establishing his six weeks residence? While he was there Clark was most attentive to a divorcee who was taking what is called in Reno "the Cure." But Clark won't be marrying his attractive woman in 1952, or anyone. That boy's had it. From now on Clark will be very wary of the marriage vows. In October, 1951, Clark filed suit against Sylvia Gable, charging mental cruelty. But Sylvia will have the last word, and with Jerry Geisler as her lawyer, it will be an expensive word. Sylvia doesn't play for pennies. Clark is determined to fight any alimony. He has bought property in Nevada and become a resident of the state—so the divorce battle of the century will not be fought in Hollywood.

Just as I would have liked to have seen Ava marry Howard Duff, so I wished that Clark had married Virginia Grey, one of the sweetest, nicest, girls in this town—instead of the flashy Lady Sylvia. Virginia has loved Clark for years, and deep down in his heart I think Clark loves her. He always runs to her with his troubles. But after Sylvia takes him through the divorce wringer I think he'll be "agin" marriage for a long, long time. Why don't you make a liar out of me, Clark, and marry Virginia?

I'm sure that Janet Leigh will be knitting booties and Tony Curtis will be popping buttons off his famous checked vests before 1952 is well into its stride. Tony says there's no hurry, but two people so much in love just have to have a baby. Another couple I predict a blessed event for in '52 is Jeanne Crain and Paul Brinkman. I saw Jeanne and Paul at a party the other night, and Jeanne was telling me about her three children, the youngest is 14 months.

"I want six children, Hedda," said Jeanne very seriously.

"I'll settle for four," said Paul.

I have already announced in my column that the Bob Mitchums, who already have two boys, are expecting a third child in the spring. A new baby is also expected at the Ricardo Montalbans, the Audie Murphys, and the Gene Nelsons. Gene wants a little girl (he has a little boy) so he can call her Jennifer and dress her in buttons and bows. And I predict that Jane Russell and Bob Waterfield will adopt another child in 1952 as a playmate for their recently adopted little Tracy.

I'm sorry to say there have been a lot of rumors floating around our town the last two months, about Bette Davis and Gary Merrill. When I asked my crystal ball if there was a divorce in the offing it clouded up completely.

After predicting that Liz Taylor and Nick Hilton would make a go of their marriage last year I should be a bit wary of the beautiful Elizabeth this year. But here I go sticking my neck out again. I don't think Elizabeth will marry Stanley Donen. I think she has outgrown Stanley. During her recent stay in London, where she was making Ivanhoe, her constant companion was the sophisticated Michael Wilding, who used to go with Marlene Dietrich. Before she left for England, Elizabeth told me, "My life has been hysterical. For the last year or so it seems that in everything I have done I've been like a person catching a train. I'm all keyed up with nervous energy."

From now on I think we are going to see a more poised, relaxed Elizabeth. After traveling around England and Paris with suave Mike Wilding and his sophisticated crowd, I'm sure Elizabeth is a more self-assured young lady. For the first time Elizabeth proved herself an actress in A Place in the Sun. In fact, it wouldn't surprise me at all if she was the dark horse that walked off with the Oscar next March. I hear that the fans and exhibitors are excited about those Taylor-Clift love scenes, and they are urging producer George Stevens to team them again. George would be crazy not to cash in on this romantic team, and George isn't crazy. So, I predict that those two beautiful young people, Liz and Monty, will be teamed again in 1952. And, furthermore, that this time they'll fall in love, for real.

WHEN Jan Sterling married Paul Douglas, Hollywood gave it the old fish eye and said it wouldn't last a year. Paul had had many wives and many girl friends; was as fickle as they come, and twice as old as Jan. This marriage has worked out perfectly, and will continue to do so. Paul isn't a Charm Boy and Jan isn't a Coo Girl. They're frank and honest with each other, and behave like adults. And there is no professional jealousy.

The coming year will bring the Princess Aly Khan back to pictures again, after her three years of luxury in smart European resorts. I hear that there are two things Rita wants very much: A $3,000,000 settlement for her and Aly's daughter Yasmin, and a picture that will establish her once more as a leading screen star. She won't get the money; she will get the picture. Her new picture, still untitled (and no matter how they write it it still comes out Gilda) is bound to go over big at the box office. Whether it's good or bad everybody will want to see the Princess Rita. No, Rita needn't worry about her first picture, curiosity will put that over, it's the second picture that should keep her awake nights. If that's a flop, she's through.

Since her return from Reno, Rita, who is awfully eager to win back those fans who lifted their eyebrows at her premarital shenanigans with Aly Khan, has been very discreet about stepping out in Hollywood, and to date has dated only one man—agent-producer Charlie Feldman. This is no romance, I guarantee. I hear that Kirk Douglas has been calling Rita ever since her Nevada trek, but without results so far. "Kirk Douglas!" I exclaimed when I heard this. "Why he isn't her type." And then I had to laugh at myself. Any girl who goes through such an odd assortment of husbands as promoter Eddie Judson, actor Orson Welles, and Moslem prince playboy Aly Khan, not to mention such boy friends as Victor Mature, Tony Martin and Ted Stauffer, just doesn't have a type. So I predict that Kirk will get his date, but that Rita and Hollywood's glamor boy lawyer, Greg Bautzer, will discover each other and become a steady twosome. Both Rita and Greg like to dance, like night clubs, and parties. But there'll be no

Dennis Morgan and Lucille Morgan are the chief cloud-painters on this LP platter, which contains ten tunes, all old favorites like Jealousy, Tiptoe Thru The Tulips and You're My Everything.

POPULAR

GUY MITCHELL—*There's Always Room At Our House (Columbia).
This song is from the pen of Bob Merrill, who wrote such best-selling Mitchell items as Sparrow In The Treetop and Belle, Belle, My Liberty Belle.

JUNE VALLI—*Always, Always (Victor).
Here's another star who'll soon be twinkling brightly; just 21, she won an Arthur Godfrey Talent Scout show and soon moved into radio (Stop The Music) and night clubs.

CLASSICAL

ANDRE KOSTELANETZ—Music of Victor Herbert (Columbia).
Another noteworthy addition to the Kostelanetz series that has devoted previous LP's to Berlin, Rodgers, Kern, Porter and Youmans.

MORLEY AND GEARHART—American In Paris* (Columbia).
This duo-piano team plays the Gershwin title song as well as April In Paris and classical works by Debussy, Ravel, Offenbach, and four others.

VIENNA PHILHARMONIC—The Magic Flute (Columbia); The Marriage Of Figaro (Columbia).
Each opera is on three 12-inch LP discs, complete with text in the original language and in English. Soloists and orchestra are splendid.

marrying for Rita in 1952, for legal reasons, anyway. As I wrote in my column:

"Rita appears to have a lot of luck—all of it bad. If she gets a Reno divorce by default it can always be set aside. And the Nevada court has no jurisdiction whatever over determining the amount of money a husband should pay for the support of a wife and child. Since Rita has established her residence in Nevada, she can't file action in California for a year."

The two hottest actors in 1952 will be a newcomer, Fernando Lamas, and a repeater, Mario Lanza. I saw some of the rushes of Fernando in The Merry Widow. When that picture is released, there'll be panting and sighing all over the land. Fernando was born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and made a number of pictures there before he was discovered by a Metro scout and brought to Hollywood. He made his debut last year in the very colorful Rich, Young And Pretty. And wait until you hear Mario Lanza sing "Because You're Mine" in his new picture. If "Be My Love" thrilled you, you're in for a double portion of thrills. The hottest girl star of 1952 will be Ava Gardner when Pandora And The Flying Dutchman is released. As Pandora, Ava has more glamor and sex appeal than the screen has seen since Garbo's Flesh and the Devil. If Dore Schary is the smart producer I think he is, he will immediately co-star Ava and Frankie in a picture. That's a box office natural.

ROCKY COOPER says that she will not give Gary a divorce. But Nancy Sinatra said that, too. She changed her mind, and so will Rocky. When Rocky gives Coop his freedom, she will take most of his earthly possessions—and he's loaded. I think that Coop will marry Pat Neal as soon as he is free. I saw them at a party at Mike Romanoff's last week—and there's no mistaking the lovelight in his eyes.

After her divorce from Bob Topping, Lana Turner will drift from one boy friend to another. In fact she has started her drifting with radio-writer-producer Cy Howard. Cy gave up his trip to Europe, where he had a date with his long time sweetie, Paulette Goddard, to stay in Hollywood and hold hands with Lana in dark restaurants. Paulette's gonna be mad, Cy.

About the clearest thing I see in my crystal ball is a divorce for George Sanders and Zsa Zsa Gabor. George, I think, will be quite upset, he loves his pretty bride. But Zsa Zsa is all set on a career. Though George pleaded with her to go to England on location with him, Zsa Zsa preferred to stay in Hollywood and play a part in Metro's Lovely To Look At. Recently, I wrote in my column "Zsa Zsa Gabor is so excited about so many projects that she hasn't time to deny rumors that she and George Sanders are kaput. What about it, Zsa Zsa?" I haven't heard a word from the lady.

Also telling it to the judge in 1952 will be David Brian and Adrian Booth. David seems to be having trouble with all three of his wives, and all three at the same time. There are also rumors about Hedy Lamarr and Ted Stauffer. Since Hedy's just about as stable as a weather-vane, nothing she ever does surprises me.

Peter Lawford, Kirk Douglas, Dan Dailey, Steve Cochran and Robert Stack will play the field in 1952, and continue to avoid any entangling alliances. When Rocky Cooper gets her divorce she'll make a pitch for Pete, but he'll give her the same treatment he has given his other girls, including the too-eager beavers Sharman Douglas and Jeanne MacDonald: great charm followed by the old brush-off. Dan told me recently that he doesn't intend even thinking about marriage again for at least two years. Bob Stack will continue to be Hollywood's most eligible bachelor, and Ann Blyth Hollywood's loveliest bachelor girl. Joan Evans turns 18 in July, and will be free to marry. She promised her mother, magazine writer Katherine Albert, that she wouldn't marry until after her 18th birthday. Joan is as smart as she is beautiful, enjoys living with her parents, and, like Ann, refuses to get married until she's honest-to-goodness in love. The very happiest couples in Hollywood will continue to be the Alan Ladds and the Dick Powells.

Gene Tierney and Oleg Cassini will not get that divorce that is always being rumored. Gene is the first to admit that she and her dress designer husband have plenty of fights, mostly due to Oleg's hot temper. I think they had a dilly this summer when Gene went off to Europe alone. But I think everything will be hunky-dory when Gene gets back from South America where she is starring in The Way Of A Gaucho. "Hedda," she told me last spring, "when I fell in love I fell in love for keeps. And I haven't any intention of letting my marriage blow up in my face just to please a few columnists." Smart girl, Gene.

Just as 1951 brought out a fine crop of new stars, so will 1952. (Some of the older ones will find it hard going, and will rush off to New York to do stage plays and television shows.) Who are these new stars destined to flash so brilliantly on the Hollywood firmament? Here's my pick: Mitzi Gaynor, Debra Paget, Leslie Caron, Pier Angeli, Debbie Reynolds, Anne Francis, Marilyn Monroe, Dale Robertson, Fernando Lamas, Dean Miller, Rock Hudson, John Harrison, Cameron Mitchell.

First and foremost is Mitzi Gaynor. Now there's a right talented young lady, and bound to be one of our biggest box office stars. She was well received as Lotta Crabtree in Golden Girl, but she'll really hit the jackpot when The I Don't Care Girl (story of Eva Tanguay) is released in the spring. Mitzi was born Mitzi Gerber in Chicago. She was a ballerina before she was out of her teens. And she sings as well as she dances. Mitzi dropped by my house one afternoon recently and I discovered several things about her: She likes to take off her shoes and wiggle her toes; she has the greatest talent for mimicry I've come across since the inimitable Elsie Janis; and there's not a chance in the world of her ever getting a big head.

"In Song Of Norway I thought I was the biggest thing since the zipper," she told me. "The girls in the company ganged up on me. The fang club was out in full swing. I soon learned that you can't live without having the friendship of your coworkers, so I piped down. If it wasn't for that experience I'd probably be mad about myself right now."

Debra Paget, five feet two, weighing 104 pounds, is as cute as a bug's ear. And a fine little actress too. She reminds some of us old-timers of Dolores Del Rio when she first came to Hollywood, 20 years ago. Debra, born Debralee Griffin, in Denver, Colorado, comes from a hep family that has been in show business for two generations. Debra's first good picture break came with Jimmy Stewart in Broken Arrow. But no one at the studio paid her much mind until suddenly the fan mail started rolling in a few months ago. The studio discovered that since the release of Bird Of Paradise, Debra has received more fan mail than any one on the lot, with the exception of Betty Grable. Next May you will see Debra in her best picture, Belles On Their Toes.

Nineteen-year-old Leslie Caron has the luck of the Irish, except that she's French. Some poor little starlets sit around Hollywood for ages before their Big Opportunity. Leslie's first picture, An American In Paris, is mopping up at the box office. One critic said of her, "She combines dancing skill with the fetching simplicity and the plump-cheeked freshness of a Renoir model." Paris-born Leslie was discovered by Gene Kelly when he was in France in 1950 seeking a French girl to play opposite him in An American In Paris. Leslie, who was dancing in the Ballet des Champs Elysees, was flown to Culver City, and given a contract. You'll see her next in Man In A Cloak in which she plays a dramatic part.

Pier Angeli, who speaks with her hands and eyes as well as her voice, has shown movie-goers that there is as much poetry in her acting as there is in her name. Pier was born in Sardinia, and lived with her family in Rome, prior to coming to Hollywood. Director Fred Zinneman saw her screen tests, which were sent to him from Italy, and immediately gave her the lead in Teresa. Fred told me, "If Pier is properly handled and gets good scripts, she can climb to the absolute top, and become one of the outstanding stars of her generation." In The Light Touch, her next picture, she'll play opposite popular Stewart Granger.

To these four add Debbie Reynolds, Anne Francis and Marilyn Monroe. Since her debut in Three Little Words, Debbie, who lives with her family in Burbank, California, has been making bids for stardom. Two Weeks With Love and Mr. Imperium will be followed by Singin' In The Rain in '52—and that's the picture that will land her on theater marquees. Tall, graceful Anne Francis, who hails from Ossining, New York, has had several minor roles, but gets her first big break in Lydia Bailey which will be out next spring. Marilyn

The reason I'm no name-dropper is that I can't remember any name long enough to drop it.

Red Skelton

Monroe who managed to steal a few scenes in the star-studded All About Eve by just looking sexy, belongs to our sex rampant department. Marilyn's a long way from being an actress, but that won't keep her from being a star in 1952. In fact, right this minute, 20th Century-Fox is writing a picture especially for Marilyn. Well, come to think of it, Jean Harlow wasn't much of an actress when she started. Nor was Jane Russell. But they did all right. And they learned to act, too.

For my money, Dale Robertson will become another great box office favorite in 1952. Dale is an illustrator's dream—he's over six feet of All-American he-man with the Oklahoman's easy approach. His mother-in-law, former movie actress Faire Binny, describes him thusly, "He's a combination of Sir Galahad, Prince Valiant, and Hopalong Cassidy." Not bad—coming from a guy's mother-in-law. The public discovered Dale, just as they did Clark Gable some years before, at the sneak preview of a not so important picture. Following the Pasadena preview of Fighting Man Of The Plains the audience followed Dale right out into the lobby and parking lot, cheered, clapped, and asked for autographs. Dale couldn't have been more surprised. Neither could 20th Century-Fox who was releasing this Nat Holt western. And then it happened a second time, following the preview of Dale's second film, another western, this time called Caribou Trail. The front office boys held a conference. "No guy," they said, "can have that many relatives." So they signed him to a contract and rushed him into five pictures in 1951, Call Me Mister, Take Care Of My Little Girl, Golden Girl, Lydia Bailey and Return Of The Texan. The last two will be released in 1952. And then watch Dale!

Another lad who is going to land in the big time is Dean Miller—and just as soon as Skirts Ahoy gets its general release next year. Dean got into pictures in a most original manner. In fact I'd say that Dean won the all time daily double without ever placing a bet. On the train en route to Los Angeles, Dean struck up a conversation with a man sitting beside him in the club car. "You from Chicago?" asked Dean. "No," said the man, "I live in Los Angeles. Where do you come from?" "I'm a TV star in Cincinnati," said Dean. "I'm going out to the Coast to look over television. Television's the greatest thing in entertainment. It's killed pictures, you know. Movies are dead as a dodo bird." "That's interesting," said the man, "pictures are really dead, are they?" So the man turned out to be Dore Schary, the big boss of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, and he was so amused by the fresh kid that he offered to give him a screen test in Hollywood. I saw the test —and by golly it's good. Oh, by the way, Dean has now decided that movies are the greatest thing in entertainment.

I also predict stardom for Rock Hudson, John Harrison (or is Harry Cohn going to change his name back to Aldo da Re which it was originally) and Cameron Mitchell. Six-feet-three, 197-pound Rock Hudson has had many minor parts since he signed with Universal-International in 1949. His best performances, however, were played with Vera-Ellen in Hollywood night clubs. But following the preview of Bend Of The River, due for release in February, the top brass at the studio decided that it was high time they did something about Rock. So the build-up is on. And he will have his first starring role in Oh Money, Money with Piper Laurie and Charles Coburn.

John Harrison (or Aldo da Re) used to be a constable in Crockett, California. He first came to Hollywood in 1950 to play a heel who was out for all he could get in Columbia's Saturday's Hero. And he proceeded to cop the best notices. George Cukor chose him for the very important part opposite Judy Holliday in The Marrying Kind, a part that will definitely make a star of him. Aldo was a football hero in school and a frogman during the war, and he is not given to modesty. After his first picture he said to me, "I have a very, very bright future. Hollywood needs a fresh face, a fresh personality. Hollywood needs me." George Cukor made a test for him. And, wouldn't you know it, agreed with him completely.

Recently over at Fox I saw the test Cameron Mitchell made for a part in Outcast Of Poker Flats, which he got. The test is wonderful, and I predict you'll be seeing a great deal of Cameron, who was a hit on Broadway not long ago playing one of the sons in Death Of A Salesman.

Last year I predicted that Bette Davis would get an Academy Award for her Margot in All About Eve, and Jimmy Stewart for his lovable lush performance in Harvey. I wuz robbed! This year I'm going to play it win place and show, and I'd better be in the money. My choice is Vivien Leigh for A Streetcar Named Desire, Shelley Winters for A Place In The Sun, and Elizabeth Taylor for A Place In The Sun. For the best performances among the actors I'd say Montgomery Clift for A Place In The Sun, Kirk Douglas in Detective Story and Gene Kelly in An American In Paris.

I suppose no Hollywood predictions would be complete without a mention of Shelley Winters and Farley Granger. Are they, or aren't they? What was it I said last year? "Farley Granger will live alone and like it; and so will his old sweetie, Shelley Winters." Well, the same goes for 1952.

Private First Class Melvin Brown,
Mahaffey, Pennsylvania—Medal of Honor

This is the season when you think of stars. The one over Bethlehem. The ones on Christmas trees.

But this year remember another star, too—the one on the Medal of Honor. And make a place in your heart for the brave, good men who've won it. Men who, oftener than not, made the final, greatest sacrifice—so that the stars on your Christmas tree, and the stars in your country's flag, might forever shine undimmed.

Right now—today—is the time to do something important for these men who died for you. You can, by helping to defend the country they defended so far "above and beyond the call of duty."

One of the best ways you can make defense your job, too, is to buy more . . . and more . . . and more United States Defense Bonds. For your bonds help strengthen America. And if you make this nation strong enough you'll create, and keep, the peace for which men died.

(Continued from page 43) the opening night at the Palladium. After the fourth number, I was ready to make my exit. I was so nervous, I slipped and fell on my fanny. Instead of laughing at me, the audience laughed with me. I knew then that the people out front were more interested in my voice than in my weight."

A good deal of Judy's past neurotic behavior has been tied up with her weight. An RKO producer who is himself a mountain of fat, once told the young actress, "There are certain people who are naturally fat. When they try to diet all the time they become nervous and irritable. Forget about dieting. It'll restore your peace of mind. Concentrate on something else."

Judy forgot about dieting and began to concentrate on Sid Luft.

EVEN though her weight sometimes shoots up past 140, Judy is sure that Sid Luft loves her. This certainty, many of her friends believe, is destined to bring Judy more heartache. They feel strongly that Luft is not the man for her. Judy insists that he is. "I can't tell you," she says, "how much fun we have together. Sid's my fellow and I don't care who knows about it."

When Judy is asked if she intends to marry Luft, she says, "His divorce isn't final until December."

When Luft is asked the same question, he answers, "Maybe you'd better ask Judy."

There is little doubt that eventually Judy Garland will take Michael Sidney Luft, aged 35, as her third husband. But first the four legal charges brought against him will have to be decided in court.

These charges are the result of a three-car collision in which Judy played a small part.

One night late in September, Luft's car, traveling south, crashed into two cars traveling east. The accident took place in Los Angeles at a major intersection.

When he was apprehended by the police, who charged him with drunken driving, Luft insisted that Judy wasn't in the car with him at the time of the accident. He said that Judy was in a restaurant two blocks away when she heard the crash and came running.

One of the college boys whose car was hit, however, told the police that Judy was definitely in Luft's car immediately after the accident. "She disappeared for five minutes," he said, "and then came back. Both of them shaken and talking incoherently. Miss Garland kept telling Luft to beat it, and I kept telling them they'd better hang around until the police came. That's when she swung at me and knocked my glasses off and broke them. I told her she'd better leave because she didn't belong in a spot like that."

Another victim in the brawl that night was an innocent witness, a Los Angeles dentist. "I saw the entire accident," he said, "and I stopped to be a witness for the boys when this man, Luft, came up and threw a punch which landed on my nose. He shattered one of the lenses in my glasses."

By the time the police arrived, Judy had left the scene of the accident. The police took Luft down to the Wilshire jail where they quoted him as saying, "I had a beer—well, maybe three. I can feel it. But I'm not drunk. The only guy I belted was the guy in the tux. Did someone see my gun, a .38 revolver? I was target-practicing a few days ago, put the gun under the seat. Did I pass the sobriety test?"

Luft was booked at 2:15 A.M. and seven minutes later was released on $100 bail in the custody of Robert Agins, his attorney.

After Luft asked about his gun, the police searched his car and found a 38-caliber revolver which, previously, had been reported as stolen from the director of plant protection at the Douglas Aircraft factory.

The next day all Hollywood was buzzing about Judy and Sid.

"Luft seems to get in an awful lot of trouble," one Hollywood veteran remarked. "He uses his fists too much. When he came back from England with Judy, he was served with a summons because he hadn't paid for the support of his son by Lynn Bari. He settled that one out of court. A few days later he had to get in another mess."

Other observers doubted the story about Judy's being in a restaurant two blocks away when the crash occurred. "How come she heard the accident," one of them asked, "when all the other customers in the place didn't?"

Through her attorney, Judy said, "I'm a human being, and have emotions just like anyone else even though I am an actress. When I saw Sid in trouble I just had to go to him."

A DAY later when the city district attorney read the police reports on the accident, he charged Luft with more than being drunk. He added the charges of drunken driving, carrying a concealed weapon, and driving without an operator's license.

Luft pleaded innocent to all these charges and asked for a jury trial, which may or may not result in his going to jail.

When Luft was asked if Judy would testify at his trial, his attorney quickly intervened and said, "Miss Garland certainly is not going to let anybody down. I'm sure she'll testify if asked to do so." The attorney also denied that Judy had been drinking. "She was just in a highly emotional state," he explained.

When February 22, 1952, rolls around, and Judy's divorce from Vincente Minnelli becomes final, her friends (and she has many) hope that she will be in a less emotional state.

They hope she will think over marriage to Sid Luft very carefully.

A former secretary of Judy's has this to say: "Sid Luft may be the most wonderful man in the world, but I don't think he's the type for Judy. She needs an older man of position and experience who can keep her in line. So far, Sid has been responsible for Judy's being hounded by a lot of process servers."

This last remark has reference to the fact that when Judy alighted from the train in Pasadena last September, she was served with a subpoena. Luft owed back alimony of close to $3,000, and Lynn Bari's lawyers wanted to get Judy into court to find out exactly how much money she had paid Luft as her personal manager during their travels.

Judy didn't have to go into court because Luft paid up with a check for $2,889.

Two days before she left for New York and her stint at the Palace Theater, Judy again was the object of a search by subpoena servers. Again agent-manager Sid Luft, ex-husband of actress Lynn Bari, was the cause.

According to a court ruling, Luft has the right to see his three-year-old son, John, for 48 hours, and keep him in custody for that length of time.

When Lynn Bari read of Luft's traffic crash and his subsequent citation on a drunk count, she obtained an order for Luft to show cause why his 48 hours' custody of their little boy should not be curtailed to protect the child's safety.

"The reason we were trying to subpoena Miss Garland," Lynn's lawyer explained, "is that she was present at the time of the accident. We want the court to determine whether Luft's drinking might endanger the welfare of his son."

"Since the granting of said (custody) order," read Miss Bari's court affidavit, "defendant has been drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, and specifically on September 30, 1951, defendant was involved in an automobile accident in which he is charged with driving while intoxicated, among other things: affiant (Miss Bari) is fearful that harm will come to minor child when he is in custody of the defendant."

Miss Bari asked the court to permit Luft to visit his son only in the presence of a person designated by her.

JUDY's friends feel that she has a big enough job looking after herself without getting mixed up in Luft's affairs.

"Judy is a grown-up woman," says a Metro producer who's known her since she was a child, "but she knows absolutely nothing about love, and very little about men. She shouldn't have married Dave Rose; she shouldn't have married Vincente Minnelli; and she shouldn't marry Sid Luft. As a matter of fact, she shouldn't get married for the next two or three years until she straightens herself out completely.

"Right now, no Hollywood producer in his right mind will take a chance on putting Judy in a picture. A Garland picture means a lavish Technicolor musical, and that costs lots of dough. If Judy should have a breakdown in the middle of it, as she did in Annie Get Your Gun, it would cost a mint. Making personal appearances two and three times a day is a whole lot more difficult than making motion pictures, at least for a star. If Judy can continue to bear up under the vaudeville routine, film producers will beat a path to her door."

Judy Garland needs to be loved. Unfortunately, she isn't the easiest girl in the world to love. She demands constant attention. She suffers from many fears.

In years gone by, she received much aid and comfort from her mother, but not too long ago there was a break between them. While their relationship is still friendly, it isn't the very warm, inseparable combine of years ago.

Sid Luft is very good for Judy's ego, but is he very good for Judy's heart, or life, or career?

According to Lynn Bari, he wasn't of very much help to her. She married him on November 28, 1943. Less than two years later, Luft made the headlines by getting into a night club brawl with Dead End kid Bobby Jordan. A few months later, Lynn Bari sued for divorce, but there was a reconciliation. After the birth of their son, Luft was involved in another fist fight with an unidentified stranger. By that time, Lynn had had enough. She filed for divorce.

"He had a standard routine," Lynn told her attorney. "I'd ask him where he was going and he'd say, 'Just out to get the papers.' And then he wouldn't come back until the next morning. When I asked him where he'd been, he'd say, 'Oh, just out with the boys.'"

Lynn also accused Luft of spending her money to develop business interests he refused to tell her about.

The judge awarded Lynn $500 a month for the support of her child, and $300 a month after the first year, plus 10 per cent of Luft's income.

When Luft began dating Judy last year, his source of income was a popular mystery, and he failed to follow up on his support payments. When Judy left for England, however, she hired Sid as her personal manager, and supposedly paid him a pretty good salary. At least, it was reported that he was stacking up on a new British wardrobe.

When the pair returned to Hollywood they returned to a load of heartache in the form of Luft's legal encounters.

This is no attempt to make Sid Luft a "heavy." He did yeoman work for Judy in England. He acted as a buffer between her and all the celebrity seekers. He said no when no had to be said, and he kept Judy in excellent mental health.

There are some men who do excellent work in overseeing their wives' careers and supervising their outside interests. Freddie Brisson has been overseeing Rosalind Russell's career for some years now. Ben Gage takes care of Esther Williams' outside interests, and Tom Lewis keeps a watchful eye on Loretta Young's. Whether Sid will do the same for Judy is still to be seen.

Right now Judy is in the process of making a comeback. Many of her friends doubt that she can make a comeback with happiness by marrying Sid Luft.

Whether Judy will listen to friends, or follow her own instincts is something no one will know until February 22, 1952.

At that date Judy will be free to marry again, and if past performance is any indication, she probably will. Whether or not she marries Luft—her friends are keeping their fingers crossed for happiness.

New and enlarged windows would mean different draperies. New curtain material meant reupholstering the furniture. Breaking up a wall would lead to a new plastering job. Plastering meant repainting and fresh wallpaper. In other words—a big production.

The prospect of all this clutter and clamor overhead didn't phase Mrs. Bartley one bit. In fact, it was right in line with her pet theory about expectant motherhood. She believes that waiting mothers should fill their lives with all the things they don't ordinarily have time for. Deborah gives many more radio performances when she's pregnant. She works for her favorite charity, the St. Anne's Foundation, and she paints.

She also thinks that mothers-in-waiting should undertake one large job—preferably one that won't be finished before the baby arrives. "That way," she explains, "you're busy concentrating on your project and hoping the baby won't come early. The times passes ever so fast, and you accomplish two things at once."

Deborah's longish job before Melanie Jane, aged four, arrived was designing and planting her very British rose garden in Santa Monica. She finished it with a few weeks to spare. The current project should be a closer race with the stork who is expected sometime in February.

The fun and excitement that Deborah and Tony seem to get from making improvements in their California home is indicative of how happy they are in America. But they weren't always this content.

When Metro signed her to a slightly fabulous contract in 1947, Deborah Kerr and her husband of one year came to Hollywood. Fresh from war-time England, they soon filled up on steak, eggs, and orange juice. They liked their work (Tony was studying American methods of movie making for his television production company). They met a lot of amusing people, and they made a few friends. They were talented, popular, and very successful, but they weren't happy.

"At first, Tony and I thought we were homesick," recalls Deborah, "so we waited a decent interval for that to wear off. When it didn't, we looked around for other causes for our moodiness.

"The answer was so obvious we didn't recognize it for months. It turned out to be a kind of homesickness after all, for we finally discovered that it was our rented house that was getting us down. You see, we were living in a small California bungalow in a narrow canyon. Nothing could have been more unlike our previous homes. The place was too new, the ceilings were too low, and the neighbors were too close.

"I stood it as long as I could. Then I tearfully confessed to Tony that we'd have to go home to England if we didn't move out of that trap."

Being a man as well as husband, Tony Bartley couldn't bear the sight of Deborah's tears. They immediately started the quest for an English-style house. "Only we didn't tell people we wanted any particular type of architecture," explains Tony. "We weren't so foolish as to narrow down the possibilities. We simply said we must have an old house, with a little ground around it to provide privacy, and we must have high ceilings."

All of the Bartley's new acquaintances and most of the real estate agents in Southern California offered to help them find a home. In turn, each friend, studio contact, and agent would call to say they knew of an old place, built before the war—six years ago. A few even found some relics dating back 10 years. Finally, Deborah explained as diplomatically as she could what her idea of "old" was. The last house she'd lived in was built a little over 300 years ago. After they heard that whopper, a lot of the agents gave up calling her.

Months passed, and she and Tony were despairing of ever finding a home to suit their peculiarities. Then one misty afternoon, they were driving through the Pacific Palisades, a part of Los Angeles which is near the beach and looks very much like the Italian Riviera. When Los Angeles was a small, undeveloped city, wealthy easterners were building winter homes in this part of town. Although most of the estates have been broken up, the old homes still have an established, substantial appearance.

As Deborah drove slowly past the 20-room houses with 12-foot walls and imposing wrought iron gates, she knew they were out of their class financially, but they held a fascination for her. They looked so old and venerable—like the country homes she'd known most of her life.

QUITE by chance the "homesick" pair noticed one rather modest house that was close to the road. Deborah couldn't resist asking Tony to stop the car. She just wanted to look through the gates at the beautiful gardens. The two of them got out of the automobile and ran towards the gates. What they saw filled them with longing. The two-story, white stucco house with its rain-washed red tile roof seemed to be waiting for them. (Later they learned that it had eight rooms and a full basement.) The property that went with it was rich in perennial gardens, wide stretches of lawn, and eucalyptus trees. An eight-foot wall on the street front and a steep palisade down to the ocean gave the house the privacy and seclusion all Englishmen seem to require.

The longer they pressed their faces against the barred gate the more beautiful the house looked. There was no sign of anyone living in it, and yet it wasn't for sale or rent.

After careful scrutiny, Tony noticed a small sign near the front entrance. "For information, apply to Santa Monica Land Co.," he read aloud to Deborah.

"That must mean it's for sale," said Deborah happily.

"More likely it's where you call in case of fire," Tony said, but he jotted down the telephone number anyway.

The next day he contacted the land company and learned more details about the house. He found out that it was part of a 14-acre estate owned by a wealthy Chicago dowager named Edith Rockefeller McCormick. The house he and Deborah had seen was called the guest cottage, but there was also a main house, servants' residence, a large garage, and a separate music conservatory on the property. All or nothing was up for sale.

Tony Bartley politely declined to make an offer for this real estate package. Might just as well have made a bid for Buckingham Palace he thought to himself. But he hated disappointing Deborah, so he made a characteristically British move. He hired a legal representative, commissioning him to purchase the guest house at or below a stated figure.

The correspondence that piled up during the negotiations was large enough to fill up a year's issues of the Congressional Record. In the end the bulldog tenacity of the Bartley's won out. The house was theirs.

Deborah had been so certain they would eventually own the lovely 15-year-old house that, long before the deal was concluded, she sent to London for her furniture. It arrived about the time they were ready to move in. Busy as she was at the studio, it never occurred to her to hire a decorator or even a secretary to organize and furnish her home. "Almost no one does in England," she explains airily. "At home we just take our time and put the heirlooms and antiques where they seem to please us most. Sometimes it takes ages to furnish a home. And I must admit some of them look rather dowdy, but at least they're a true expression of the home owner's taste."

The conclusion that can be drawn about Deborah Kerr's taste as reflected in her home is that it's one of quiet refinement touched with the unpredictable. In her living room, for example, the only two colors are grey and pale gold. The furniture consists of fine 18th century antiques. The couch and chairs are upholstered in gold brocade to match the draperies. The effect is restful and unobtrusive. A graceful Queen Anne desk stands at one end of the room and a refectory table at the other. A pair of water color portraits by an English girl, Eileen Chandler, show Melanie at 18 months and Deborah in a pensive mood. They are the only wall decorations except for the mirror over the fireplace. Several of her mother's Crown Derby cups stand on the mantel and then, quite in contrast with the rest of the room, a fat china pig, covered with painted flowers rests beside the fireplace. If you ask Deborah why Melanie brought the pig into the parlor she smiles and says, "She didn't. I put it there. I just happen to like it."

The sun room, which links the dining room with the living room, and the indoors with the garden, is a kind of informal gathering place full of books, record albums, the piano, and art objects picked up from Italy to the Congo. Deborah sensibly furnished the long narrow room in earthy browns and greens. The big easy chairs are covered in a brown nubby fabric and the walls are a cool shade of eucalyptus green. Here the family heirlooms have been converted to practical use. The highboy Tony uses as a compact little bar was a Bartley antique. The old pewter beer tankard on top of it was a wedding present. And the pair of highly polished whale oil lamps beside the couch where Deborah likes to sit and sew, were found in a second-hand shop right after she and Tony were married. The lamps are too squatty for good reading light, but in this case sentiment outweighs practicality.

FURNISHING the dining room started as a joke. It all began with Tony's straying into an auction room on Wilshire Boulevard one evening when Deborah was working late. He was so fascinated by the auctioneer's spiel that he couldn't leave. When the oval dining table with a base of three carved feathers came on the block he bid for it. Much to his surprise, he got it at a ridiculously low price. He had it sent home like a comic valentine.

"I laughed, but I loved it," Deborah says. "It seemed very funny at first to have a table with the traditional Prince of Wales feathers supporting it. But we bought eight chairs to go with it and a small table-for-two where Tony and I eat when we're alone. That filled up our dining room except for the niches."

It was during another evening's aimless wandering that they strolled into a Hollywood antique shop. Deborah spotted a pair of large, gaudy blackamoor figures. Tongue-in-cheek she offered the dealer a price for them, he quickly said, "Sold."

Home in the maroon, grey and white dining room the figures didn't look as gaudy—merely gay. Tony put concealed lighting behind a narrow moulding and the blackamoors add a lot of character to the Bartley dinner parties.

In spite of the considerable changes Deborah is making upstairs in her own room, nothing will be touched in Tony's adjacent study-bedroom. He made that quite clear before she started her redecorating job. Tony recently finished a TV film in Africa called White Hunter, which explains why the only television set in the house is opposite his day bed. He must keep abreast of west coast television.

In the four years that Tony and Deborah have lived in America, neither of their families has been able to visit them. So far they've done all the traveling. They've always packed up Melanie Jane, her Scotch nurse, tons of luggage and spent their holidays in England. Regretfully, Deborah Kerr admits that none of their immediate family have seen the beautiful Bartley home in Santa Monica. Last Christmas, however, she received the gift that makes her home complete. Her grandmother sent her Mrs. Beetons' Book of Household Management (circa 1880).

"Without this housewife's Bible no proper English girl can ever run a home," explains Deborah. "Grandmother was apparently waiting until I had an established house. After the book came, we knew for sure we were at home in California."

The fall of 1949 was the real start of them. Peggy had been invited to a party at the St. Regis where everyone was celebrating Carol Channing's success in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. Peggy's own accomplishments seemed small when compared to those of all the celebrities gathered there at that moment. What had seemed like such a big part in The Sleeping City, which was shot in New York, had been whittled down to only a day and a half of work.

Looking around the room, she noticed a handsome young man come in with a ravishing looking girl. There was something so familiar about him! Where had she seen him before? Their eyes met, and his glance lingered on her. He was seated at a table at the other end of the room. Puzzled, she looked for him from time to time, and saw him moving closer table by table. Then suddenly, she discovered his chair was back to back with her own!

"I beg your pardon," she heard herself saying, "you're going to think I'm terribly bold, but I'm sure we've met before."

"I have the same feeling," he answered. They started comparing life histories.

FINALLY they were back to the years when he was Lt. Walter Helmerich III, an Air Force ferry pilot, stationed at Kiesler Feld at Biloxi, Mississippi, and she was a student at Gulf Park College nearby.

Recalling the sight of a dreamy fellow bringing his bright blue convertible to a stop before the dorm, she exclaimed, "You're Susie's Walt!"

"And you—you're Jo' Varnadow! Why didn't you say so!" he came back.

"Whatever happened to Susie?"

"Oh, she's married now, and has two children. . . ."

They chattered about those days and before the night was out, he was saying, "Don't let Hollywood change you!"

"Well, I certainly hope it does change me," she was retorting indignantly.

"Don't you want a family and . . ."

"Of course, and I expect to have one someday. . . ."

"Relax," he laughed.

"This is no time for me to relax," she exploded. "I'm just getting started on my career!"

Their conversation was brisk and exciting, but it was a while before they had another. Walter had to go back to Harvard where he was a student in the School of Business Administration. However, a wire came from Boston just as Peggy was ready to leave New York for a visit home in Athens, Tennessee. It read, "You're the nicest thing that's happened to me."

When she arrived in Athens, there was a huge portrait of the man waiting for her! He telephoned her constantly, and one of the calls was to make a date for the Sugar Bowl game in New Orleans on New Year's Day. He knew that her parents as well as his own always attended. It would be a chance for the families to look each other over. Peggy accepted the date, but the day before Christmas she was ordered to be back in Hollywood on the 27th. She telephoned Walter in Tulsa to explain. An hour later she received a telegram listing every plane stopping in Tulsa enroute from Nashville to Los Angeles, calling particular attention to one flight which had a two-hour stopover. He urged her to take that flight. Peggy asked her mother's opinion and Mrs. Varnadow said, "Why it's entirely up to you, Jo'. If you like this boy, I see nothing wrong with a two-hour break in the monotony of the trip."

On the plane, Peggy told herself, "I'm a fool to be doing this. I don't even know this boy!"

By the time the plane landed in Tulsa, she didn't have the courage to step out of it. For 15 minutes she peered out the window and saw no sign of him. Then she decided that he'd had a change of heart, too, so it would be safe for her to go into the airport cafe for a soda. As she crossed the lobby, she saw him dashing madly from window to window of the airline office trying to find out what had happened to her. Finally, he spied her and came running over.

They went to the club for lunch where she met his father, a brilliant, dignified man. Then they discovered that her plane's departure was delayed three hours so there was time to take her home to meet his mother and sister.

"They all were wonderful to me," Peggy tells, her eyes glowing with the memory.

After she'd been back in Hollywood awhile, Walt suddenly showed up explaining that he was on "spring vacation." He had another "spring vacation" only a month later and tried to persuade her to marry him; but the flying trips seemed to denote a pretty irresponsible student to Peggy.

"He was 28," Peggy tells, "and a real man about town. He had an apartment of his own in New York all the time he was going to school at Harvard. He dated models, actresses, and other very attractive girls. They dined and danced at the very best places. I knew I wasn't the type who could spend hours shopping and at beauty shops, just so I could look perfectly groomed for lunch at '21' every day.

Hollywood is somewhat backward, claims Peter Donald, because where else would the trailer come before the main vehicle?

Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

I explained this to him. 'I don't like that sort of thing,' I said. 'I can't live that kind of life. I can never hold a man like you.'"

"But I want someone like you," he protested. "Someone like you to be the mother of my children. Someone who respects her religion the way you do. Someone I can respect the way I do you. And, of course, you respect me. . . ."

That was when Peggy dropped her bombshell—June, 1950. July and August were months of silence.

Then suddenly he was there in front of her again, his arms full of flowers, the lovelight brighter than ever in his eyes. But absence making the heart grow fonder wasn't what won Peggy.

What won her were the callouses on his hands and the 20 pounds of weight lost in the dirtiest, hardest, most back-breaking jobs in the oil fields.

He'd gone back to Tulsa that June day and told his father, "I'm ready to go to work for you now."

With the solid practicality which had taken him from oil field laboring jobs to the head of the Helmerich-Payne oil drilling firm, Walter Helmerich sent his son to work in the oil fields. "And no favors for him," he instructed his men. The men took him at his word, too.

The new Walt told Peggy, "I don't know how long I'm going to have to work in the fields, but one of these days I'll prove to my father that I'm capable of stepping into an office job."

"Of course you will," Peggy answered.

YET last summer, when Peggy moved into an apartment of her own after spending two years in the Hollywood Studio Club, she wasn't talking about marriage. She said then, "Of course, I've thought about marriage. Seriously, too. I've always felt it's right for a woman to sacrifice a career to her marriage. But I don't believe it would be fair to Walter or to me to get married this year or next. My career is at such an exciting point that if I left right now, I might find myself regretting not having found what could have happened. That wouldn't be good." Then she added, "Maybe these are the changing times with which I should change. Perhaps I'm climbing the steps to confidence where I can successfully combine a career with a happy marriage. I just can't give an honest answer about it yet."

She couldn't be completely honest then because Walt was still in the oil fields trying to prove his capabilities. Perhaps unconsciously Peggy saw that until he did he wouldn't be able to accept a wife's career in comparison to his own just then.

But by the end of the summer of 1951, Walt could excitedly tell her he'd made the grade. He had an office of his own at long last!

"What an office he has," she smiles. "I never saw such a tiny one in my life! Why, it isn't even big as a closet! But already Walt is showing his father that the years he spent at Harvard weren't wasted."

Peggy went on to Athens where her parents planned to give a party announcing her engagement. Those plans were abandoned when Peggy's grandmother unexpectedly passed away. Early in October, the announcement was made to the newspapers without any festivities. The rumors grew about the "wealthy young oil scion's" plans for his bride.

"Walt and I have made out our budget on his earnings," Peggy sets the record straight. "Far from having the home some reports said Walt was building for us in Tulsa, we're going to live in a rented apartment there. The kind he can afford. Our one extravagance so far is a seven-foot-square bed which will go into our one bedroom that is only 10 by 12. I plan to commute from my picture assignments. Walt insists I'll have to maintain myself in Hollywood out of my own earnings. He thinks I'll get tired of doing that after I get used to having him support me.

"He thinks I'm the greatest actress in the world," Peggy laughs when asked if he dislikes her being an actress. "So far I've not been the kind of actress I want to be. I think it's essential to know what you lack in ability. When you find your mistakes—approximately—then you're all right, because you can correct them.

"However, Walt and I are making no definite plans of any kind about my career, or about having children. We're going to face things as they come. I expect a great deal of understanding from Walt because I expect to give a great deal of understanding. We don't feel ours is going to be a 50-50 marriage. How can it be between two career-minded persons? There will be, we realize, too many times when one of us must give all. And that's what I expect in our marriage.

"I realized only recently that we don't have to wait to be married. It wasn't just the way Walt buckled down and proved he could do something on his own, either.

"After I finished I Want You, I went to Washington, D. C., for personal appearances. One day I was at a luncheon table with some really brilliant and influential men. As I listened with awe while they talked of government, industry, and arts, I thought how lucky actresses are with all their opportunities to meet such people.

"Yet some career women don't take their husbands along with them because they might not be able to hold their own in such company. As I sat there thinking of all the boys I know, I could see only Walt fitting in, sharing the experience, enjoying himself. He has the intelligence and talent to get along with people in all walks of life. I realized how lonely I was. How much happier I'd be sharing this with someone. That was when I knew it was right to marry him soon."

The beautiful diamond ring which Walt designed was on Peggy's finger when she left Hollywood in mid-October to keep the wedding date at home in Athens on November 24. It takes awhile to get ready for a formal, candlelight wedding where more than 300 guests hear the vows spoken before the white rose and chrysanthemum banked altar of Keith Memorial Church, and then crowd the Varnadows' 10-room house for a reception. Peggy's younger sister Ann was to be maid of honor, 17-year-old Cadijah Helmerich would be among the bridesmaids, as would Jane Lampton Connerly, Peggy's best friend from Gulf Park College days, and her cousin Clyde Afaye Green. In addition, Peggy's adopted cousins, small Jane and Betty Hendricks, got ready to be flower girls all dressed in white.

The couple would fly to Hawaii for a honeymoon, and come back prepared to be blissfully happy. . . .

Peggy has no false modesty about the change she made in Walt. She feels that a woman sets the standards of her marriage and that the man who really loves her wants her to do so.

Just after her engagement was announced, Peggy met Director Bud Boetticher on the studio lot. He said, "Well, well, Peggy, what's the fellow like?"

"Oh, Bud, he's just crazy about me!" she exclaimed.

"Well, I'll swear, Peggy," Boetticher shook his head, "usually the lines read, 'I've got the greatest guy!' "

But then he hadn't directed a script like Peggy's real life one—one where the guy was sent out to win her respect and to prove she could hold him! THE END

it's a great life

(Continued from page 30) According to the people who write about the stars, there are only two types of actresses. There is the racy glamor queen who toils on a sultry boudoir set all day and sidles around the hot spots all night. And there is the shy, introverted, serious-minded actress who is overly careful of the roles she plays and who hurries home after work to spend the evening in solitary contemplation.

It's convenient for writers to establish all actresses in one of these categories. To them a star is either a nearly dissolute person or an angelic creature who never laughs out loud. There is, however, a middle ground—and that is where June Haver lives. In her movie roles she plays some pretty racy parts, providing there is a story line reason for them; and in her private life she is known as one of the most fun-loving girls in Hollywood.

All one has to do to get a pretty clear picture of June is visit her apartment on Wilshire Boulevard. It is large, airy and very modern in decor. If you were to see pictures of it you would suspect it was the home of Ava Gardner, Hedy Lamarr or one of the other great glamor girls. What-nots as nonsensical as can be bought are scattered about the mantels and along the ceiling mouldings. One entire wall of the den holds a tremendous record collection, which includes, along with a healthy sprinkling of the classics, most of the jive and jazz albums of the day. The furniture is bleached blonde and rugged, bright colored fabrics cover the sofas and chairs. The phonograph is always going. And the walls are decorated with paintings of all sorts of subjects, many of them clowns painted by June herself. It is the home of a girl who likes to live

MAYBE a good way to explain June Haver is to tell you that she is the biggest movie fan in town. She's been crazy about one movie star or another from the time she was six. Her fellow stars on the 20th Century-Fox lot still chuckle when they remember her first days at the studio. Although she had been hired as something of a glamor girl herself, June showed up for work on that first day with just one purpose in mind. She was going to see as many movie stars as she could—and collect as many autographs as she was able.

Armed with a good pencil and a new autograph book, June invaded the commissary. There had already been considerable publicity about her signing a contract but she didn't act like it. The first star she saw was Tyrone Power and she nearly fainted. When she got hold of herself, she approached Ty's table and timidly held forth her book. Ty raised an eyebrow, but scribbled his name—and June, with a curtsey and a thank you, drifted away on Cloud Number Nine. The same thing happened with Alice Faye, and several others, and by the end of the day the players' favorite topic of conversation was the new girl who seemed more interested in collecting autographs than being in the movies herself.

Sonia Wolfson, a veteran publicity woman at 20th, still laughs about her first meeting with June. She had been assigned to publicize June and stood ready to take down her life story and make her famous.

"Now where shall we begin?" Sonia asked when June reported to her office.

"Well," said June, "if it's all right with you, maybe we could sort of walk around the studio and see if we can find anybody interesting."

It was all right with Sonia, so the two girls spent the entire day visiting sets and collecting signatures. Sonia says it was the oddest—and most interesting—assignment she's ever had at the studio.

Shortly after that there was a big party held at the home of a famous star for the French War Relief. Ty Power and June were the guests of honor. A top photographer had been asked to attend and get a picture of Ty and June together for a magazine layout. He posed them at the end of the garden, but every time he was about to snap the shutter, June's head swung around so she could look at Ty and her mouth fell open in astonishment that she was having her picture taken with him.

"Miss Haver," the photographer finally snorted impatiently, "I'm supposed to get a glamor picture of you and all you do is stare like a lost puppy who has just found his master. Please look sophisticated."

June Haver hasn't changed much since then. She has been the star of more than a score of films herself, but she still retains the youthful verve for movies she had as a kid. She just refuses to fall into the ways of the professional screen siren.

The life June Haver lives today could be called, in all honesty, a model one. Making a picture, she works like a beaver, is never late on the set, is obedient to her superiors and kind and understanding to the underlings whose duty it is to take care of her hair, wardrobe, makeup, etc. When the day is done she goes home, changes and generally has dinner with her family or a date. And she is in bed early, so she won't hate getting out of bed at dawn the next morning.

Actor describing a director: "He has a mind of his own. But it's on loanout."

Mike Connolly in Daily Variety

When she is not working, her days are filled with a combination of fun and good deeds. Her greatest playtime passion is golf, and if she can possibly find the few hours necessary to walk around 18 holes she is on the links every morning, rain or shine. She lunches with a girl friend or her sister, Evelyn, and then spends the afternoon at her avocation, decorating.

Although June has earned a reputation as one of the cleverest decorators in Hollywood, and has done many fine homes, she has never taken a penny for her work. When she makes the contract to do a home or apartment, she stipulates that the fee is to be paid to a charity she selects. And through her efforts, a group of nuns from Ireland see movies in their convent home on their own projection equipment; a church in need of a fund to feed and clothe poor families of the parish suddenly finds its coffers full; a bunch of college boys without furniture for their fraternity house suddenly discover they are living in the lap of luxury—all through June's decorating racket.

This sort of life is comparatively new to June Haver, though. "When I first came to Hollywood," June says, "I guess I was as giddy as any other kid who had suddenly been zoomed to the heights. It took a little while, but one day I realized that I was a movie star and I wasn't living like one. I went out and bought a lot of fancy clothes—going into debt to do it—and I started to swank around the town like a latter day Gloria Swanson. If my phone wasn't ringing constantly and I wasn't dated up at least two weeks in advance I wasn't happy."

Just exactly what it was that changed June, or rather brought her back to a sensible mode of living, even she doesn't know for sure. It was no doubt her family, though, for her mother, sister and grandmother have a tremendous influence on her. They are more close-knit than most families in Hollywood, and feel that each one has a stake in the other. This is due to the fact that when June was a very small girl, and showed promise of being extremely talented in things theatrical, the job of getting her to the top became a family project.

If there was an amateur contest of some kind and June was entered, it looked like an avalanche of Havers when the door was opened to the contestants. If there was an interview with a newspaperman or prospective employer, the whole family went along lugging books of clippings and took part in the conversations. June was the performer, but she was only part of the team.

When she became a star—and realized it—a family council was held and it was decided to set June up in an apartment of her own, so she could rest better and learn to stand on her own feet.

"I think it was about that time," June said, "that I began to take stock of myself. I realized that just being a movie star was not in itself satisfying. I had to make it mean something. So I would come home in the evenings and try to figure out how I could improve my personal life, as I had my professional life.

This wasn't as easy as it might sound. In those early days, June, in deference to California law, was still going to the studio high school. She would be in the midst of an algebra problem when a call would come from the set and she would suddenly have to switch to making love. She never quite adapted herself to the fast transitions. But she did become more serious minded and tried to take all the aspects of her new life in stride.

Although she doesn't like to talk too much about it today, because the subject is still painful, Dr. John Duzik, who passed away so tragically last year, was the most dominant factor in June's life.

Dr. Duzik wasn't like Hollywood people. He was not the least bit impressed by movie stars since many of them were his patients. When he met June, she was just a cute little blonde from the Middle West who had somehow managed to get herself in pictures. She, on the other hand, saw in the doctor something she had failed to find in all the glamor boys she'd been dating. He was handsome, but in a natural rugged way—not sleek and elegant as he turned out. His interests, aside from his practice, were pretty ordinary. He liked to hunt and fish and play golf—and he didn't care a hang for the parties and premieres of Hollywood.

June found herself in love with him. After work she'd go home and prepare a fine dinner and call John up and ask him over. This was during her "thinking" period and it is certain that their after-dinner talks did much to mold her into the kind of woman she is today.

ALTHOUGH June had been a religious girl from her earliest recollection, she never knew the real meaning of a religious life until she met Dr. Duzik. It wasn't anything fanatic with him, it was just a way of spending each day, and June decided his belief was for her. She has been that way ever since—not fanatic, just devout in her faith.

June Haver describes how she lives better than any writer could.

When asked how she reconciled her strong faith with the life of a movie star she said, "It's so simple, and so easy. Holiness is not a sombre thing. It is my vocation to bring happiness to people by entertaining them. It is a wonderful vocation because it allows me to have such fu while I'm doing what I should.

"I wasn't put into this world by accident. There was a divine purpose in it. It is obvious at this stage of my life that my purpose was to bring others happiness and the movies let me do so."

Among the men who take June Haver out there are fellows who have been called wolves. They get dates the same as the less dangerous fellows, but with June they are perfect gentlemen. They save their leering for another night—with somebody else—but it is obvious that they are having a good time.

You might be driving down one of the main streets of Hollywood on a sunny afternoon and pass a convertible with the top down and spy June and a handsome lad in the front seat. The radio will no doubt be on full and the boy and girl will be laughing and yaking it up. If you have been under the impression that June is a stuffy person it might surprise you, but it is actually her true self you see.

She is a great practical joker. When there is fun on the set, it will more than likely be June's sense of humor that brought it about. If you could attend a party at her apartment, or at the home of her mother and sister, you would find that June is the guiding hand behind the games.

June is, according to her mother, the greatest party planner since Elsa Maxwell. She is the one who lugs in the pumpkins at Thanksgiving—the one who arranges the dinner with the gag place cards. And, at Christmas time, she is the one who drags in the biggest tree in town and arranges the fabulous dinner. And when it comes time to pass out the presents, June is the Santa Claus.

June Haver is, indeed, a strange creature in Hollywood. It is not because she is odd, but because most of the rest of Hollywood is odd. She is just the kind of girl that Rock Island, Illinois, expected she would grow up to be. She is the kind of girl you'd like to have live next door. The kind of girl who would go for a walk with you if you're blue, or be your date at the Country Club ball and make every guy jealous.

June Haver's philosophy of life is based on the Golden Rule. It always has been. Her first public appearance of any kind may have set the pattern of her life and her thinking. She was about seven years old. Her mother and father lived in Cincinnati and they had entered her in an elocution contest, sponsored by a local newspaper, which was to be held in the ballroom of a big downtown hotel. June was terrified. Her mother knew it, her sister knew it and no doubt the whole audience knew it. But when she stood on the stage when her name was called, she stuck her chin way out and looked several thousand people collectively in the eye.

"The title of my recitation tonight," she said, "is 'Who's Afraid?'"

She was—but she'd never admit it to anyone.

"You know," she says now, "I'm a real lucky girl. I'm in the public eye and I love it. I'm doing just what I've always dreamed I would do. People don't think I care very much for success, but I really do. And when I go to sleep at night, I'm grateful, not just because of the good things my success has given me, but because I know I am in a position to pay it all back. The motto I live by is: 'To whom much is given—much is expected,' and I want to give every day of my life." THE END

top man

(Continued from page 20) In the 24 years since that dismal day, a lot of movie film has spun through Hollywood cameras, and plenty of it has captured the rugged features and personality of John Wayne, the ex-prop boy turned actor. And as 1951 spins into 1952, he has won another award, this time one considerably more substantial: The readers of MODERN SCREEN have just named John Wayne the most popular male star of 1951, the walk-away winner of MODERN SCREEN's famous Popularity Poll. And today things are very different for Duke all around.

Only a few months ago, Howard Hughes, who bosses RKO studios, buzzed for his production chief, "Tev" Tevlin. He explained that he was determined to star John Wayne in Flying Leathernecks, but that the star was shaking his head reluctantly. He liked the script fine, but after a man-killing schedule he was tired and wanted a vacation. So Howard Hughes had a question:

"What's the highest price ever paid a Hollywood actor for one picture?" he inquired.

Tevlin did some quick mental research and came back with a rough answer—"Something slightly over $200,000."

"Offer John Wayne $250,000 to make Flying Leathernecks on a six weeks' schedule," Hughes ordered, "with a $17,000 guarantee for each day it runs over."

Since Flying Leathernecks ran three days past deadline, John Wayne collected $301,000, which is a lot of money even in Hollywood. But then John Wayne is a lot of man—in Hollywood or anywhere else. Howard Hughes, who is a shrewd operator, knew what he was buying. He was buying the biggest male box-office attraction in the whole world.

AT 44, when most Hollywood heroes are fading fast or long since shoved out of the running, John Wayne is at the crest of his amazing career, which towers over all other he-man careers in Hollywood. In all the word implies, he's the movies' top man, unrivalled, nonpareil. But if you believe the people he works with, he has no more ego than a potato.

Last year when the nation's theater exhibitors picked him as the biggest box-office draw in their annual "Fame Poll," Duke was down in Mexico. His agent thought that the news rated a long distance call so he telephoned South of the Border the minute he learned it early one morning.

"Congratulations!" he enthused. "You're head man of Hollywood! You've just won the 'Fame Poll'!"

"What the hell's that?" came back Duke. Then added grumpily, "You woke me up."

At that point, nine of John Wayne's pictures were playing simultaneously in these United States and in one city two theaters, cat-a-cornered from each other, both blazed out twin John Wayne bills on their marquees. That year he earned well over a half-million dollars, and looking over his starring commitments realized he was booked up clear into 1951. Duke's reaction to all this was, "I guess I'm having a long string of luck."

That modest theory, of course, is patently absurd. Duke Wayne has traveled a long and often rocky road to his fame. What got him there was that he traveled it the hard, straight way and stayed, as John Ford says, "always looking, always learning, until he mastered everything he ran into."

By now John Wayne has run into 151

picture parts, and he's starred in every one. He's made them in three days, from start to finish, and in three years, which Jet Pilot will probably take, start to finish. His price has risen from $1,000 a movie to the big six-figured bait which Howard Hughes dangled to snare him for Flying Leathernecks. But the battered old beaver hat which Duke Wayne swiped years ago from John Ford has never become too small for his level head.

Duke's basic contract is still at Republic, but it's really no contract at all—only a handshake with his boss, Herbert Yates. His agreement with John Ford is even less legal than that—just an unspoken understanding that whenever Ford wants Duke for a picture all he has to tell him is when.

In all his years spent in dog-eat-dog Hollywood John Wayne has never stooped to polish an apple, or play the movietown political or social game. In all his years around a prying, gossip-mad community he has never landed in any scandal, although he's never played it cozy or cautious. On the contrary, Duke's had a ton of rogue male fun, with bottles and sometimes belles, when he was on the loose before and in between his marriages. But he's had his sport like a gentleman and never hurt anybody, including himself. He's made millions of dollars and while he's still not a rich man, he's met all his obligations and helped a lot of his less lucky friends meet theirs.

Along the way, he has never trumpeted his own horn or played to the grandstand, professionally or in private. Bev Barnett, his press agent of 13 years, still confesses, "I don't know why he hires me." Duke never notices whether his name's in the papers or not. He hasn't had an interview in over a year. He doesn't prod any highly organized fan club to plug him. And not for a minute has he kowtowed to pressure or opinion of any kind.

Duke went through the divorce from his first wife, Josephine Saenz, a Catholic, knowing he might draw hurtful censure from religious groups; and he married his present wife, Esperanza, also a Catholic, in the Presbyterian church of his own faith. He took on the presidency of the Motion Picture Alliance for the Preservation of American Ideals, to fight Communism in Hollywood at a time when some influential circles in Hollywood were pink as sunsets and yelling "Fascist!" at everyone who called a Red a Red.

The day that Duke assumed his second term at that patriotic post, was the same day that a notorious Commie writer got the heave-ho at RKO, where Duke was making Leathernecks. Somehow the ousted scribbler coupled the coincidence, and figured it was John Wayne's doing. That night in his dressing room Duke found a note.

"Dear Rat," it read. "Congratulations on being named head rat of the Motion Picture Association of Rats." And it went on phrased in the kind of raw, unsubtle insults a schoolboy might pen. It was signed with the writer's name, but Duke thought it must be a gag. "No writer wrote that," he reasoned, "it's too crude." However, a signature check proved it was real and Duke began to burn. "What's this guy like?" he asked James Edward Grant, his favorite writer, who was there too. Jimmy saw the making of a rib. He thought he'd throw a scare into Duke.

"Why, he's about your build, Duke," he advised, "only a lot huskier—and considerably younger. In fact, if I remember right, he was Golden Gloves champ back in Chicago a few years ago." But Duke was already yanking on his coat. "Where are you going?"

"I'm going to find that guy and beat the living hell out of him," stormed Wayne. He might have, too, if Ward Bond hadn't breezed in at that moment, learned the score and protested, "Duke—hold it. You can't hit that jerk. Why he's only five feet tall, wears glasses, and can't punch his way out of an ice cream cone!"

"Aw nuts," Duke cooled down. "I never have any fun."

BECAUSE Duke is a big man—he's six-feet-four, 210 pounds and sleeps in an oversized bed—and because he leads a rock 'em and sock 'em life on the screen, a lot of legends swirl around his head as they swirl around any hero's. One of them is that John Wayne is a truculent bruiser always itching for a fight. Actually, if he'd gone through with mopping up that fabricated Commie husky, it would have made exactly the third real scrap Duke has had since he started in pictures.

The first took place some years ago outside the Coronado Hotel, near San Diego, where Duke was on location. For his role he sported hair that lapped his shoulders.

He was dancing with a pretty girl, when a wise guy, noticing Duke's long hair, sidled up. "Woo! Woo!" he sneered. "Have no fears about that big pansy, honey, he's harmless!"

Something about the situation made Duke see red, so he invited the guy and his friends outside and dusted them all off. But it was quick and without much fuss.

The second battle, down in Mexico more recently, was even shorter. In a bar one night a tequila-happy Mexican got abusive about gringos and slapped Duke, who just gave him a shove and sent him reeling across the room. But he bounced back with a knife, and this time Duke picked him up and tossed him out of the joint like a basketball. He didn't come back.

A young actress who shall be nameless was under the direction of Alfred Hitchcock, considered one of the finest in the industry. Hitch always sketches the set-up for new scenes and turns them over to the cameraman to prepare for action. He returned to the set to find the young actress facing the direction opposite from what he'd called for. He asked gently how come. The girl said rather imperiously, "This is my better side." Hitch paused a split-second, then pronounced, "My dear young lady, you are sitting on your best side."

Kolma Flake

There was a time, of course, when Duke and Ward Bond, Preston Foster, Johnny Weissmuller, and some other Hollywood giants engaged in beautiful brannigans around the Hollywood Athletic Club and aboard John Ford's yacht as members of the fabulous "Emerald Bay Yacht Club," a seagoing beer bust society. Doors were smashed off hinges, floors sagged, and people got pushed overboard in the rough-house fun—but that's what it was, fun—and nobody got mad. As long ago as those shillies were, they still boost Duke's local fame as a brawler, and his pictures take care of his reputation in the outcountry.

Actually, Duke Wayne gets all the scrapping he wants out of his job. He can remember few movie parts where he hasn't wound up swinging his fists and, no mistake, he's good at that. "Nobody walks up from behind and slaps Duke on the back on our set," his makeup man, Webb Overlander, says. "He's always on the ready, he whirls like a cat, and he just might let go." But it would be automatic, not angry. In fact, with Yakima Canutt, Duke invented the modern technique of movie fist fights. Screen sluggers used to sock each other on the shoulders until Duke and Yak evolved the present method of narrow, timed misses past the jaw with the camera at a trick angle to make it look real, and the "sock" dubbed in later.

"There's no star who knows his job better," John Ford'll tell you. "Duke's a natural reactor. He works from the inside out. He knows himself and he makes it his business to know exactly what dramatic spot he's in. He studies it painstakingly until he has it dead right. Then he figures what he would do in that spot and does it. What comes through is a real man in a vital dramatic situation. There's no finer kind of male performance."

And James Edward Grant, who has written so many of John Wayne's scripts and directed a couple, snorts, "People think in cliches. Because John Wayne is a big ox, doesn't twist his face all around, they think he's stolid and dumb. Duke can spot a hole in a script quicker than I can. He's an expert on western history, and costume, an expert on camera lenses, lighting, and all the technical business of picture making. He's always looking around. If an extra's wearing the wrong kind of uniform Duke spots it. If something breaks down he's jumping in to help fix it. If a stunt man won't work a stunt, Duke will. On every set he's got the whole shooting situation well in hand."

Grant Withers backs that up. Grant's a long-time buddy and has worked in dozens of John Wayne westerns. "Duke," he says, "always plays a scene looking out of the corners of his eyes at the rest of the cast. When something they do rings false to him he says, 'Woop—I muffed it!' and stops the scene. Then he asks them to talk it over and help straighten him out. What he's really doing is straightening them out."

Duke keeps 11 people on his personal payroll, and that's the sort of thing that gives Duke's business manager, Bo Roos, high blood pressure.

"How am I ever going to make you a rich man," he's constantly growling, "when you've got half of Hollywood around your neck?" To which Duke shrugs and replies, "What's money stacked up against friends?" and obviously that's the way he feels about it.

Once on location in the High Sierra, Duke and his picture crew got in a red hot poker session. Wayne's terrific at cards, especially deadly at poker and bridge. This night he killed off 10 or 12 of the gamblers until only Grant Withers was left. But let Grant tell it—

"I'd been playing poker too much," he recalls. "I couldn't afford it, and Duke knew I couldn't. It was table stakes this night, and after everyone was knocked out they ran pretty high. Finally there were several thousand dollars in the pot and I was sweating. If I didn't win it I was going to be pretty broke, and for a long time.

"I laid down three kings finally and Duke flipped over three aces. Then he swept in the mountain of chips and tossed them all up in the air, to rattle down like hail.

" 'I've been laying for you!' he said. 'Are you cured?' And he wouldn't collect for one chip. I've never played a hand of poker since."

You pick up stories on Duke Wayne like that everywhere you look.

IN more ways than money Duke Wayne is generous with everyone but himself. Right now the most precious commodity he owns is time, and what spare moments he has between pictures go to two things—promoting Hollywood, and fighting Communism. Between The Quiet Man and The Sea Chase he took on a COMPO tour of 21 cities. He made personal appearances to plug Hollywood's "Movietime USA" campaign, and to speak at the American Legion Convention. Yet he's still shy and personals are still painful. Every night when he climbs in bed, Duke carries a stack of books with him to study up on current events for the MPA post. He'll let no one else write his speeches for that; he takes the job very seriously and is militant in his war on the Kremlin.

All of these activities have constricted most of Duke Wayne's sporting hobbies and changed his leisure life, if you can call it that, completely. He owns part of a tennis club but he doesn't play. He owned part of a golf links, too, but never got around to traveling the course.

Even the deer and quail hunting and marlin fishing trips he used never to miss in season are out, and have been for the past several years. Sometimes Duke manages a day of "skin fishing" off the Isthmus at Catalina, and then he soaks in the water six and eight hours at a stretch. But instead of taking off with his old spear diving pals, like Johnny Weissmuller or Ward Bond, he takes the kids along. "To tell the truth," Duke has admitted, "that's how I like things now—family style. Maybe I'm just getting old." But that's not necessarily so.

Duke has always been a worshipping, and worshipped, father, and despite the divided home his kids have, he's unusually close to them. The two boys, Michael and Pat, have even worked in a couple of his pictures. With their sisters, Toni and Melinda, they spend every week-end at his place in Encino. Of them all, Michael, the eldest, is the nearest thing to a carbon copy of his dad—tall, manly and quiet.

Wherever he is, Duke stuffs his pockets with gifts for the kids, but he doesn't spoil them. The oldest girl, Toni, is enrolled at Immaculate Heart Conservatory in Hollywood; Patrick and Melinda go to Cathedral Chapel; and Michael goes to Loyola. It's a long run from their home in Hancock Park where they live with their mother, and Michael needs a car. Last spring the heap he had started to come apart. Duke took up the matter of a new car.

"I'll give you all the dough for another second-hand one," he offered, "or I'll give you part of the price of a new Chevvy, if you'll work out the rest yourself." He could get Michael a summer job running errands for Bo Roos at the Beverly Hills Management, he explained. "I'll take the job and the new car," Michael decided, which made Duke smile because that's what he'd have done.

His present wife, Esperanza—whom he calls Chata—took the Wayne brood over to Ireland this year to visit their dad making The Quiet Man there. The main reason Duke went for the $140,000 Encino place was to entertain his kids. Before, he and Chata lived comfortably enough in a small Van Nuys ranch house, with one bedroom and a converted den with a day bed. But there wasn't anything to keep kids busy there, and no place to sleep, especially when Chata's mother was up visiting from Mexico.

The new place, on four wooded acres, has a vast sloping lawn, swimming pool, stables, and a riding ring where horses soon will gallop around with the Wayne crew aboard—and inside the big country style house there's plenty of bunk room.

Duke first met Esperanza Baur on a business trip to Mexico City where he'd gone planning to buy a theater. But the minute he looked into her dark eyes at The Reforma he forgot business and concentrated on romance. He never bought the theater, but by the time he left there wasn't any question about what the 20-year-old senorita had done to his heart. Chata and her mother came to Hollywood on a six months' visa, and they carried on their courtship there. They were married January 17, 1946 in a church in Long Beach where Duke's mother had said her vows.

After the rites, he fumbled desperately around in the pockets, which he'd forgotten to fill, and finally had to whisper over his shoulder to Grant Withers, his best man, "Hey, give the preacher a hundred bucks, will you? I'm broke!" Chata thought the whole thing screamingly funny, and still rags Duke about it.

Duke and Chata flew to Honolulu on their honeymoon, about the most beautiful spot for romance you can find in the world. But what they saw of that tropical paradise was little more than the inside of the Royal Hawaiian Hotel. In fact, for 20 days of their 21-day stay it rained constantly, and the newlywed Waynes camped right in their hotel room, which most brides and grooms will admit is a constructive way to spend a honeymoon, although no sightseeing tour.

Today there are absolutely no rules in John Wayne's castle—and a man's castle it certainly is. At home, as most other places, he's the boss and Mrs. W. likes it that way. In fact, she works it that way. Whenever Duke comes home, that's dinner time; whenever he gets up, that's when the day begins; and whenever he decides to go to bed it ends, whether it's eight o'clock or four in the morning. When Duke works up a yen for enchiladas and chile relleno, Chata can cook them as no one else can—although they have a Mexican cook. The rest of the time she sees that the steaks are thick and red rare. There isn't a stick of furniture in the whole house where lazy legs or a number 12 shoe can't park without a protest, and a highball can't sit. All of Duke's friends are welcome whenever they show up, and they're met out on the drive, as Duke always is, rain or shine; and sometimes they get the hug he rates—but not the kiss. A guy can't share everything.

The Waynes have arguments now and then, usually they're noisy, but always about something pretty tiny, like who played what card like a dummy, or who'll drive the car. Once, Duke came home to find the furniture shifted around and his favorite reading chair in the wrong place. He raised a rumpus as any man has a right to do when his wife does something outrageous like that. But all in all, there have never been any serious storm signals hoisted over their house since they were married. They've had second, third, and fourth honeymoons to Hawaii, South America, and Mexico, too, and when Chata flies down there alone to see her family there aren't any divorce rumors.

So right now things couldn't be rosier for Duke Wayne. He has a cozy home, a quartet of handsome kids, a worshipping wife, money enough to make all of them happy, and a career which could use six John Waynes if Hollywood had them around. Unfortunately, if you believe the people who worship Duke, they smashed the mold when they made him.

And even if John Wayne eventually becomes president of the United States, one thing seems certain. He'll still be just "Duke," the greatest guy in the world to his friends—as they all are to him.

At home Grant Withers prizes a picture that Duke gave him once, and on it is scribbled—"You can count 'em on your fingers, Grant. Count me in!"

Everybody who knows Duke Wayne and loves him would like to scribble the same thing right back. In fact, in a way, that's exactly what Modern Screen's readers have just done this very month to their favorite star. The End our christmas love story

(Continued from page 27) in the last 10 years that Miriam and I have not stopped to remember our first together. That was in 1941, a horrible year for many people, but wonderful for us because we were young, married, and so terribly in love. It was a strange Christmas. Everywhere the grim tension of war was in the air and people were trying extra hard to enjoy themselves, to buy a little more than they had planned, and to be a little nicer to their fellow man. You noticed it on the streets—people celebrating with the feeling that perhaps it was the last Christmas they'd know for years, perhaps forever.

It was in this atmosphere of premeditated good cheer that Miriam and I, like many other young people, were married. I got my draft notice just about the same time the decorating crews were hanging wreaths and red-nosed Santa Clauses all over New York, and I suppose that the Christmas carols blaring from every store window and the churning crowds on Broadway had a lot to do with the ultimatum I presented to Miriam one brisk December evening. "Either you marry me now, or I can't guarantee whom I'll be seeing while I'm in the army, or that I'll be single when I get back."

"Let's get married right away," she said. And even though the future yawned black, we were married the following Monday.

Our wedding day was not as spectacular as we would have liked it to be. Both Miriam and I were working—she as a specialty dancer in Panama Hattie and I as a skater in It Happened On Ice—and while Monday was my day off, Miriam had to dance in the evening show that night.

I SPENT most of Monday morning trying to make my room at the Hotel Belvedere look something like home. Fortunately, the management had just redecorated the whole floor, so the drapes were new and the furniture reupholstered. The little Christmas tree I'd bought from a market on Seventh Avenue helped a lot. It looked fine once I got the lights and a box of tinsel draped over it. And Miriam's mother helped me to bring over her clothes and her Christmas presents.

At two-thirty that afternoon, we made a mad dash for City Hall through the mobs of Christmas shoppers, and arrived just in time for our three o'clock appointment with the Judge. The ceremony, as they say, was brief but binding. Then Miriam and I, my best man, and June Allyson, who was Miriam's maid of honor, made another dash for the Wellington Hotel for our wedding breakfast. (Actors always eat breakfast in the afternoon.) We had our pictures taken by Bruno, glowed together from the congratulations of our friends, and then suddenly, or so it seemed, it was time for Miriam to be at the theater.

I have had to kill a lot of time waiting for job interviews, or sweating out difficult takes on the set, but no three hours in my lifetime were longer than those I spent waiting for Miriam's show to finish that night. First, I went back to the hotel to see that everything was in order. Then I walked for awhile down Broadway. Everywhere I looked, people were being impossibly happy, while for me the clock hands dragged. I went into a movie without even looking at the marquee. It turned out to be a horror picture, The Werwolf Of London! Finally I went over to Miriam's theater to finish my wait.

When I carried Miriam across the threshold of my hotel room, lighted only by the soft glow of the Christmas tree lights, the whole world was closed out. For months, I had been hiding champagne glasses away in the top drawer of my bureau. We used them all up, toasting each other and our future, each time breaking our glasses against the radiator and crossing the stems on the mantel.

We both had to work the next day, and Christmas Eve, and Christmas Day. So we didn't have time to do a lot of shopping for Christmas. We spent Christmas Eve with Miriam's mother and father at the hotel, and opened our presents together after we got back from doing our evening shows. It wasn't a lavish Christmas, but it meant a lot to us because we both had a feeling that it would be the last one, for awhile, that we would spend together in a place of our own.

The next year, it was only luck that we could be together for Christmas. I had joined the Signal Corps and was touring with the company of This Is The Army. For awhile, it looked as though we would be held over in St. Louis, but, fortunately, Miriam was able to meet me in Chicago. Two days before Christmas, we entrained for California, and we spent the holiday listening to the wheels click on the rails.

In 1943, I spent a hurried Christmas with my parents in their home in Santa Monica, actually just a few days jammed in between the Los Angeles and San Francisco appearances of This Is The Army. I called Miriam, who was working in New York, on Christmas Eve, but we couldn't talk long.

I suppose a lot of guys spent the Christmas holidays in 1944 in bleaker spots than I did. By then, the troupe had moved to England, and on Christmas Eve we were presenting the show to another swarm of entertainment-hungry GI's. At least, that Yuletide, I had mail from Miriam.

The following Christmas was a different story. We spent the holiday in Australia, and as far as presents and letters from home were concerned, it was just another day. I didn't get my Christmas packages until eight months later, when we passed through Honolulu on our way home. They had followed us all over the Pacific theater, and were mashed, crumpled, and beat up. But even in August they looked good.

In 1946, Miriam and I spent our first Christmas together in three years, and in our own apartment. We had a lot to rejoice about. Our baby was due soon. I was dancing in movies, and the future looked good. On Christmas day, Miriam cooked a big turkey and we had both of our families over for dinner. It was a wonderful day.

Since we have been back together, Miriam and I have tried to combine the celebration of our anniversary and the Christmas holidays. Of course, we've always given one another little personal gifts on our anniversary . . . like the purple velvet fez I picked up for Miriam in Egypt, which she plans to use someday as the piece de resistance of a sleek Oriental outfit she designed herself. But in our own minds, the anniversary of our marriage is so closely associated with Christmas and the spirit of the holiday that it has not seemed to call for any special celebration.

Our son, Chris, has understandably altered the way we celebrate Christmas. When there were just the two of us, we always opened our presents on Christmas Eve. But to a child, Christmas would not be Christmas if he could not awaken to the delirious joy of discovering suddenly, with one sweep of his eyes, a room full of presents that were not there when he went to sleep. Chris goes absolutely wild on Christmas morning.

His first really meaningful Christmas was in 1949, and that holiday was for us, too, a particularly memorable event. In late November I was able to get my first long break from the pressure of work, and Miriam and I packed up and took a long-delayed honeymoon for four weeks. We drove up the coast to Oregon, through the redwoods, and then back south through the mountain lake country of Northern California. At June Lake, where we stopped for a few days, we cut our own Christmas tree and brought it home with us. On Christmas morning, I shot several hundred feet of film of Chris opening his packages, film which will always be an important part of the movie library I began the day we brought Chris home from the hospital.

Last year, we spent our first Christmas in our new house. We had a beautiful tree, with packages piled so high it took us most of the morning to open them.

On previous Yuletides, Miriam and I had always tried to make our gifts to one another extremely practical. But last year our presents were a complete surprise. Miriam gave me a new Bell and Howell movie camera that I had always admired but hesitated to buy for myself. I gave her two suede outfits, a coat and a suit that she had admired in a shop in Las Vegas when we were vacationing there.

This year, we are looking forward to a bang-up Christmas at home and we hope that Miriam's father, who is now in New York, will be able to come out to spend the holidays with us. We intend to have a big open house for our friends, our old friends and the countless new friends that we have made in the past two years. We want to give Chris the joyous kind of Christmas he will remember all of his life.

But also, this year, we plan to make a big personal event of our wedding anniversary. I don't know exactly what it will be, but I'll have to come up with something tremendous to make Miriam realize how much our 10 years together have meant to me.

I know, too, that our anniversary certainly will be a proper occasion for both of us to count our blessings, and to begin thinking about our plans for the next 10 years.

Now that my career is progressing faster than I ever dared hope it would, Miriam and I would like to have more children and a larger permanent home to raise them in. If things keep going along as well as they have these last two years, we may get them both by our 11th anniversary. It's certainly worth working and dreaming for. THE END

IS THERE ANYONE FINER?

A friend of mine was serving overseas in World War II when a famous female vocalist came to his theater to entertain troops. Some of the men in his group were detained and didn't make it back to the camp in time to see the show. Having heard about it, they were rushing toward the camp when they passed her as she was leaving. They broke into cries of disappointment and she stopped right there on the road and sang four numbers especially for them. That's why Dinah Shore is the favorite vocalist of lots of ex-GI's.

Can you blame a greying Clark Gable if he doesn't relish having to live up to the label of booming masculinity slapped on him years ago? Or a balding Charles Boyer or Humphrey Bogart? But it isn't just fear of appearance that breeds such reluctance. A general distaste of being on exhibition develops no matter how eager a star may be to get around at the beginning. There is nothing grey about Peter Lawford, but neither does he appear to be as gay as of yore when it comes to meeting his fellow men informally. Wherever Peter used to go you could always find him in the center of things, and identifiable by the loudest, most carefree laugh in the place. Not so now. Take that Hawaiian trip he made late this past summer. He didn't go into hiding exactly, but in a way he darn near disguised himself, and certainly he kept in the background.

He stopped at the fashionable Royal Hawaiian but dressed like a beachcomber, and rarely shaved. You'd have had to take a long look to recognize him even if you'd known him for years. He liked to hang around the beach at Waikiki but only around the edges of it. Most of the time he sat far back, against the wall of the Outrigger Club, and in the shadow of it. He seldom was alone with a girl. Most of the time he was with two other fellows, and if there was a girl there would also be another boy along.

WHAT has changed Peter Lawford has also changed Jennifer Jones. Everyone in Hollywood remembers that when Jennifer got started in pictures she was middling shy but could warm quickly to affability. It takes her much longer to break down her shyness now in a casual meeting with anyone. In fact, when people happen to visit her set when she is resting between scenes, she becomes a sky starer. They look at her, and she can only stare at the sky. If she has to talk to someone, say in an interview, she reverses direction and often stares at the ground.

Jennifer also used to be noted as having a pretty good memory for names and faces. She still has a good memory or she would not be able to handle the sort of parts she gets. Yet any number of people who have worked with her find she fails to recognize them when they pass. This is by no means an unusual failing. Behind it is not snobbery, necessarily, just difficulty in reacting in an ordinary manner when your whole life has become extraordinary.

A photographer for a national magazine, who has known Jennifer since her first days as an actress, passed her one afternoon and smiled a greeting. There was no response. She acted as if she had forgotten him completely. Curious about this, he walked up to her later and greeted her again, this time by name. And he added, pointedly, "You remember me, don't you?"

She gave him a quick look, and then acted greatly relieved.

"Why, Joe!" she cried, "of course I do."

"Then what was the matter a little while ago?" he asked. "I smiled. You went right on."

Jennifer shook her head helplessly. "I don't know," she said. The truth may well be that she didn't.

MANY stars are painfully shy, and many times they acquire this shyness after success. If this seems odd, consider what happens to a girl whose first big role knocks over the box office. The producer, knowing that she has become a valuable asset, orders a complete evaluation of her, from personality to general education. What is her background? Does she impress people as a socialite or a shopgirl in casual contacts? Does she know how to talk, to walk, to dress?

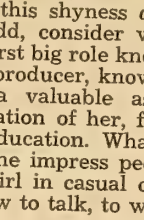
The experts go to work and in essence they practically pick her apart. Despite the fact that she has made good in a picture she may have many deficiencies, and all of them are brought out into broad daylight. If her pride is shattered in the process it shouldn't surprise anyone. Most people are better off not knowing how far they are from perfect, but the young starlet is told. Thereafter though her name may be in lights, her ego is liable to be in a mess.

Incidentally, producer David O. Selznick, the man Jennifer Jones married after divorcing the late Bob Walker, found it necessary to hire a special coach to teach Jennifer about clothes early in her career. This was Anita Colby's job at the studio for some time, and Jennifer was never sent out on personal appearance tours unless Anita was along to keep an eye on her wardrobe. To many girls such personal supervision would be insulting, even psychologically harmful. How it affected Jennifer is not known, but it is doubtful that she was very happy about it.

There are other factors which wear away at the girl who is an overnight success. Having enjoyed no particular social advantages, usually, she is suddenly pitched by stardom into the company of very clever people. If she can't live up to them intellectually she may react by hating them—by disliking to place herself in a vulnerable position with any new people, for that matter. If, on the other hand, she chooses to play with them, she not only has to develop a taste for the cultural, but she has to work at it.

Rita Hayworth worked. About the time the whole world was wondering whether Hitler was a madman or a military genius, a friend of hers dropped in one day to find her reading a weighty book—Klausewitz on tactics of warfare.

"What are you doing with that thing?" the friend couldn't help asking.



Rita let the book drop wearily. "What else can I do?" she asked. "The people I go out with now talk. They talk about everything. I want to talk, too, and before I can I have to get a little background."

On the other hand, Betty Hutton and Jane Russell probably wouldn't be caught dead with Klausewitz—and are just as happy. But that may not be too happy. Jane, for one, is wary of meeting strangers. She is tired of having them look as if they expected her to slouch about, talk slang, and attack the nearest man. Jane does know a lot of people outside the movie business, but most of them are her old high school friends. "I like the kids I've grown up with," she says. "They know me and I don't have to explain myself to them."

JANET Leigh and Jane Powell are similar in many ways—young, exuberant, and given to quick smiles. But Janet has yet to learn how to live with stardom as smoothly as Janie. Part of Janie's popularity, not only with her fans, but with her associates in and around her studio, is due to the fact that she seems to forget about her professional standing. You feel, in talking to her, that she actually enjoys being a young and beautiful woman more than being a young and beautiful star. As the former she is quickly and easily accepted, and everyone, including Janie, feels more comfortable at the absence of pretense. The other afternoon she was shopping in a cut-rate market which is rarely patronized by the well-to-do, let alone well-to-do stars. Coming around one of the food counters, she ran into a man she sees from time to time at the studio in the course of her work.

"Well!" he said, "this is a surprise. I thought you would do your buying at one of our fancier stores." Janie had her opportunity to explain that she just happened to drop in and was not a regular patron. Probably nine out of 10 other stars would have done this. But she didn't. She told the truth. "I know these places better," she said. "I was raised on them."

Janet has tried to take a common sense approach to her triumphant rise as an actress. But there is a certain amount of nervousness about her which she cannot hide. She tries to, under a flow of constant chatter, but this, in itself, is a sort of give-away. And at times, words have failed her altogether under the stress of personal appearances. One of the last of these occasions was a hospital benefit performance at a theater. Janet was introduced and stepped to the front of the stage to make a response. But she just couldn't get started. After an embarrassing pause she uttered an apology and fell back. The audience took it good naturedly, but Janet still cannot understand what made her mind go blank. And she isn't too happy about recalling such instances. The thought that it might happen again is very unnerving.

EVEN Gary Cooper, who has been a top movie name for 20 years, is hardly master of himself when he meets his public in person. When the going is particularly tough and he is struggling to express himself, he will reveal his mental agony just about the way he does it on the screen—shifting about, twisting his hat in his hands, and contorting his face until it resembles a crumpled paper cup. So perhaps a younger man like Howard Duff is not to be blamed if he, too, is far from poised on such occasions. Howard doesn't writhe physically when he is ill at ease. He is more apt to withdraw into long, awkward silences.

A man whose job it sometimes is to write feature stories about Howard has learned that one of the ways to shake him out of a brooding, monosyllabic mood, is to startle him with an unexpected and very personal question. "Is it true you were once jailed by police?" he will ask, for instance. As it happens, Howard was in the toils of the law once . . . but it was the result of a youthful escapade no one, not even the police, held against him. The point is that something about Howard's success gets between him and the outside world and prevents a natural, easy contact. That "something," as we have seen, is not easily licked.

Tyrone Power hasn't got it licked. He used to avoid newspaper interviews for one thing. It's still hard to pin him down for a press or magazine story. Diana Lynn is intellectually and artistically a superior person, yet, strangely enough, falls very quiet in a gathering, meekly so. And there have been parties from which she has run off to burst into tears over a fancied hurt. Is Victor Mature bothered by people? You wouldn't think so; but everyone knows he used to get uncomfortable when he'd have to stop his car at a boulevard light and the occupants of the car next to him would gaze over and study him. Just to give himself something to do, Victor installed a phone in his car and when stalled in traffic would pick up the receiver and pretend to be engaged in a conversation. It was pretense because the phone was never actually hooked up.

You can keep adding Hollywood names to this list and find only a few who actually enjoy meeting their audience in person. Bob Hope, who is an exception, once expressed the reason for it in his own inimitable way. "Up there on the screen you're a moving target," he said. "But when you meet them in person and there is something about you that they don't like—brother, you're a sitting goose!"

A few weeks after the violent collision between Dore Schary and Mario Lanza, it became evident that something had to happen. You can't have the most exciting new star on a movie lot feuding with the bosses, and expect nothing to come of it. There is always somebody who brings straight thinking to the situation.

In this case, the peace-making was begun by Mario's wife, Betty.

As Mario says, Betty is a girl who is familiar only with the truth. And Betty has a great thing in common with her husband. She hates lies and liars. She knows that even a small lie gives birth like a guppy to seven dozen other lies, until there are a whole army of them.

So Betty, one day, picked up the telephone and called the director, Joe Pasternak. They faced each other in the living room of the Lanza home, and here, condensed, is what Betty said:

"This has got to stop. My husband is an honest man. He may not be like other movie stars in Hollywood. He may not have settled down to a behavior pattern so that he is acceptable to two dozen minor executives whose names you and I don't even know. But we have to do something about this, because you are beginning to believe all the lies that have grown up about him, and so has Mr. Schary.

"Mario is hurt, because these lies have grown so big that nobody—even you—even bother to ask if any of them are true. We have to talk about this right now, before you and Mr. Schary think that Mario is no good, as you probably do. And if you do, I can assure you that Mario thinks you are no good, too—even double and triple no good."

SO, they talked, Mario joining them. They got right down to cases, such as the time Mario threw a studio employee bodily out of his dressing room. They examined the case in detail, and Joe Pasternak, a sensitive, emotional man, agreed that he would have done the same thing himself. He might have gone even further, and given the fellow a pair of black eyes in the process, because there are some things you never say to or about a man, if you want to stay healthy.

The matter of noise, and general "hell-raisin' " were also entered into. It was agreed that you can't take a man like Mario Lanza, with a heart and voice like an erupting volcano, and expect him to behave like an easy-going actor with 10 years of experience in studio relations.

When it was all over, Joe Pasternak said, "I love you both. You have got to talk like this to Dore Schary. Why, he doesn't even know what makes you tick!"

Shortly thereafter, Dore Schary came to Mario's house. The production chief and the star faced each other across Mario's desk, and the favorite son of South Philadelphia said to Dore:

"You are a big shot. You are a no-good stinker. And I will tell you why!"

Mr. Schary retorted in kind, and they went on from there. At the home of Dore Schary, a dinner party waited for hours, then gave up and fell apart. Two men, who normally are busier than a pair of snipers on the battlefront, were learning to know each other. When Dore Schary left the Lanza home, late that night, he left as a lusty friend, for he'd discovered that in his high tower as the mastermind of some 60 pictures a year, involving as many stars, the reports that had filtered through to him about Mario Lanza were highly distorted.

And Mario's rebellion had centered on this very fact: it had been impossible for him to take his problems directly to the top level.

Why? Because there is jealousy at the lower levels of Hollywood, as anywhere else. And, if Mr. Lanza has an argument with anyone, it sooner or later will blossom into print, largely distorted, to the great glee of the individual who "planted" it with a reporter on the prowl for a sensational bit of copy.

That is what happened on the subject of Mario's excess weight.

"Look at me," Lanza said. "I've got a big frame. Big bones. All my life I didn't weigh too much for my size. When I came to Hollywood, I was around 179 pounds, and I could eat everything in sight. Then came The Great Caruso. Imagine, all my life this man is my idol! All of a sudden I get the chance to play him on the screen. I have got to be Caruso! I don't want to be just an actor who doesn't look like the man, singing his songs.

"No, I want to be this man, and this man, as he grows older, gets heavier. Everything about him grew bigger. His songs, his build, the little way he strutted. The people around him—he collected them as he went along, more and more of them.

"So, I lived like Caruso, and I ate like him, and I behaved like him, in my private life, as nearly as I could. But, all those at the studio could see, was that I was getting fatter and fatter. Well, I have not the conceit to say I gave the public Caruso, exactly, but I would like to see somebody else do better—and that's what almost ruined me, for a while.

"I was 230 pounds when I finished the picture—not 240 pounds. Two hundred and thirty. We are telling the truth and we must be exact.

"And then what happened? I didn't know it, then, but my metabolism began to run away with me. My bones must have been hungry for years, and the corpuscles liked the drunken spree they were on—and didn't want to quit."

The truth of the matter was that dropping 40 pounds wasn't too hard. The weight hadn't been there six months ago, and it could be tapered off.

And this is where Mario Lanza makes a unique confession of his own:

"I heard the story that while I was up in Oregon I returned the script of Because You're Mine, without even reading it. That is not true. The truth is that I hadn't been sent a script. I guess everybody should know that the first version of many great plays are just plain lousy. To get a good story, writers have to work and revise. To get a good suit to fit, you have to keep trying it on for size.

"That's the way it was. The premise of the story—about an opera singer who gets

I SAW IT HAPPEN

My wife and I were invited to spend a week-end with friends in the San Fernando Valley and driving down, my wife decided she needed some lighter clothes. We stopped in a small Valley shop with an attractive window display and upon entering the store, were both struck by the beauty of the saleslady.

"Really," said my wife, "you look so much like Maureen O'Hara of the movies."

The saleslady smiled. "I am Maureen O'Hara. You see, I own this shop with a friend and every moment I'm not working in the studio, I come out here to sell.

Stanley E. Pilarski
Los Angeles, California

drafted, is excellent. But, with a movie, even more than a play, the idea has to be worked over for a long time. You can't open a movie out of town and then fix it.

"Well, when I finally did see Because You're Mine, I wish I had refused to look at it. The script didn't fit. Even the studio knew that, because they were already revising it while I was reading.

"In the meantime, the mistake I made was that I hadn't bothered to knock off that weight. I didn't want to do the picture as it was, so I figured I could just go to the studio and show them how fat I was. Then I wouldn't have to work until everything was straightened out. But do you know what happened? Because of Caruso, they didn't care if I looked like a blimp. They just said, 'Oh, don't worry about that. We'll shoot anyway.'

"So you see how much untruth can get around, if nobody corrects it. Half of the columnists said I was feuding with the studio, and they were sore about my weight. The fact is, they didn't care how heavy I looked. Only I cared!"

So, what happened about his weight?

Just this. Mario spent four weeks on his new ranch, near Medford, Oregon. He rode horseback, chopped wood, took long walks. He ate enough lean steak to feed an army. And when he came back to Hollywood, he had slimmed down from the 230 pounds he carried as the aging Caruso, to an even 200. He had 10 pounds to go, to attain the weight he's going to carry from now on.

"The truth is," he said, "that I am not a prize fighter, and I am not going to live like one. It's just that I have to get that metabolism under control. So, my doctor has been giving me some thyroid extract of some sort. It's not a big problem, and I figure that after you have told this story, maybe people will know the truth, and the press will stop talking about it."

Now let's see what else there is about Mario Lanza that has set Hollywood on its ear, and caused a barrage of the most fantastic stories ever turned loose in one concentration on a movie star. For one thing, there is the matter of "how long his voice will last."

This is Mario's answer: "All I have to do is bend one ear to the wind and I hear that I am 'already straining on the high notes. Already, ha! Look, I love to sing. It is not an effort for me to sing. And when I hear that I have only a couple of years to go before I start slipping, I laugh. And I can laugh as loud as I can sing.

"This January, I am 30 years old. People who know about these things will tell you that my voice will not reach its full power and maturity until I am 35 years of age. Then, from 35 to 45, the voice will be at its full strength and tonal quality. After that, with a certain amount of care, a singer can do all right until he is 70. So all I can say as far as singing my best is concerned, I am not even born yet!"

This year Lanza will gross more than $400,000 on royalties from recordings, and a total of around $800,000 when his concert tour and movie salary are included. He is doing very well for a young man whose talents have been scarcely touched. He is already working on the "10-cent dollar." Meaning that out of every dollar he owns, he gets to keep only a dime. But nobody need feel sorry for him—he gets more of those dimes than 95 per cent of the people.

There again, is a reason why he frequently is resented as a Johnny-come-lately. He's ten times more successful than a lot of people who've been around Hollywood for years. They're not making it. They can't see why this singing fellow should have it so good. So, when he comes roaring through the studio in high good humor, he is watched (by some) with ever-ready resentment.

If Mario chooses to whack a grey-haired extra lady (who loves it) on the bustle, he is charged with having no respect for womanhood. If he winks at a pretty girl, he is charged with philandering.

Mario Lanza has even been called "heartless."

Heartless, with a voice like that? It would be the world's most incredible contradiction. This accusation, doubtless has its birth in Mario's new-found unwillingness to sing for anyone and everyone, at the drop of a piano lid. If there has been any real trouble with Mario, so far as it concerns him, personally, it has been that he has had too much heart.

He has refused to treat his voice as the major factor of his livelihood. He has always behaved as though he were a writer of the five-thousand-dollar-a-week variety who would sit down and toss off a story for everybody he met. Now he knows that he mustn't throw away his talent. Most people think that the reason Mario sings so much is that he hungers for the praise that comes, everytime he tosses back his head. The truth is that he likes to be among happy people, and he'd be a fool if he didn't realize that he spreads a lot of joy with his voice.

Consider the case of Raye Phaseno, the little 10-year-old girl in Newark, New Jersey, who was dying of a rare form of blood cancer. Everything had been done for Raye that could be done. Everything that is, capable of accomplishment by the medical profession.

Little Raye Phaseno was a fan of Mario's. In semi-delirium, she constantly called for him. She wanted to see Mario before she died. And there, in the hospital, her yearning was translated into action.

A long distance telephone call was put through to Hollywood for Mario Lanza. He could not be located, because he was en route to his ranch in Oregon. Of all the people Mario knew in Hollywood, one secretary was touched by the urgency of the call. She remembered that her boss, who was with Mario, had mentioned a motel at which he once stopped, just above the California border. She secured a list of Automobile Club recommended motels, and systematically began to trace the singer until she found him.

"I hate to put you to all this bother, Mr. Lanza," she said, "but there is this little girl in Newark," she explained to him.

Ten minutes later, Raye Phaseno was talking with her idol. "I wish you could come to see me," she told him.

Mario explained how impossible this was, knowing all the while that Raye might be dead, before he got there.

"But you know how it is with you and me, Raye," he continued. "I can come right into your hospital room with a song. So you tell me what I should sing."

Raye told him that he would be ashamed of her, for what she wanted, because of all the great songs he had recorded.

"But I am just a little girl who doesn't know very much," she said, "and of all your songs, I like the 'Teena Lina' best."

Mario sang it then, with tears running down his cheeks. And the song, not the tears, soared all the way to that Newark hospital room to give birth to a miracle.

Raye Phaseno lived for many weeks, but that was not the end. It was the beginning of her intimate friendship with Mario who called her on the telephone every day, talked with her, sang to her. And in between calls, he arranged to have the finest record player, with a complete stock of his records, installed in her room. This was the magic that kept Raye alive, from day to day, when doctors could have sworn that she had at best only hours to live.

Raye Phaseno's parents found it impossible to adequately express their gratitude. In letters they referred to Mario as a messenger from God.

"That is not true," Mario said, "but in all my life I never had, or will have such a gift as the friendship of this little girl."

Unfortunately only one man cannot bring solace to all the ill and grief-stricken in this world. There must come a time—many times—when Mario Lanza cannot respond to the requests that are made of him, and this worries him tremendously.

The result is that a considerable portion of the money that an ordinary celebrity would put into various business projects, Mario channels into five favorite charities. As for his songs and his heart, they belong to his family—his wife, Betty, and his children, Elissa and Colleen.

All of these things can be told about a man like Mario Lanza, but the most complete definition of a man can only come from a best friend, such as in this case, Ray Sinatra.

Ray Sinatra, a first cousin of Frank Sinatra's, and Mario's song arranger, says:

"You will always hear people say that Mario is temperamental, hard to get along with. Well, that's a lot of baloney. He takes criticism and advice, without batting an eye. I've seen him work five solid hours, recording eight tough arias, and he was stronger when he finished than when he started. And once, when he finished recording 'The Lord's Prayer,' the entire orchestra, 36 professional, hardboiled musicians, stood up and applauded the man, shouting 'Bravo!'

"I'm telling you straight, Mario Lanza is going to be the greatest of them all. I'm sick of hearing about his being better than Caruso. There was only one Caruso, and there will never be another. And there is Lanza, and there will never be another. But Caruso died before he reached his prime. Mario is just getting started.

"As for whether or not this kid will last in Hollywood is pretty much up to Hollywood itself. So far as Mario is concerned, he's got 30 years of great singing ahead of him, and it doesn't make much difference to the world, where he does it!"

Mario? What does Mario say? He says this: "I was born young and alive, and I'm going to stay that way. If this is misbehaving, I've made the most of it!"

(Continued from page 14) she had even scolded reporters at the airport when they asked her to comment on the separation. "What separation?" she had innocently asked.

Gable also insisted upon extending the fiction that he was sublimely happy.

He was even happier, however, when Lady Sylvia filed her complaint. But this happiness turned to sorrow when Gable learned that Sylvia wasn't too anxious for an early hearing. In fact, she was hoping for a reconciliation.

Gable has been divorced twice before—once in 1930, from Josephine Dillon, a dramatics coach, and once in 1939, from Rhea Langham, daughter of a wealthy rancher. Both of these divorces cost Clark a pretty penny, but at least they were friendly.

The divorce involving Sylvia Gable is not. Attempts have been made to settle the dispute amicably, but to date, none of these have worked out, and the divorce has developed into a knock-down, drag-out affair.

As of November, Gable was determined not to pay his fourth wife a single penny in alimony, contending that she was an extremely wealthy woman in her own right, having acquired quite a bit from three previous husbands.

The basic source of Lady Sylvia's fortune was from Douglas Fairbanks Sr. Back in 1935, Sylvia's first husband, Lord Ashley, publicly charged Fairbanks of alienating his wife's affections. After the divorce, Sylvia married the dashing actor. Four years later, Fairbanks died, and Sylvia inherited more than a million dollars.

Gable was irritated when he learned that Sylvia planned to take her own good time about following through on the California divorce. The more he thought about his 17 months with her and what it had cost him, the hotter he grew under the collar.

He finally decided that he would file suit in Nevada, where a legal divorce is obtainable in six weeks. In California, a divorce takes at least a year to be final.

Gable drove up to Glenbrook, Nevada, where he ran into Frank Sinatra and Ava Gardner. This was in September. When reporters asked if he were contemplating a divorce, Clark said, "I'm just up here to soak in a little sun." He lolled about Lake Tahoe in shorts, played golf, took things easy. But the newsmen knew what he was up to when he applied for a Nevada driver's license and changed the California license tags on his car to Nevada ones.

"Okay," Gable finally admitted. "I'm in the process of making myself a true resident of Nevada. I'm even looking around for a ranch, a small place, maybe 100 head of cattle. You want to know about the divorce. My six weeks is up on October 4th or 5th. If I need a Nevada lawyer, I'll get one."

Gable has always been cagey with the press where his private life is concerned, and this time was no exception.

Actually, the entire divorce plan had been worked out with his Los Angeles lawyer, Bill Gilbert, long before he'd even set foot in Nevada.

The plan was simple. Gable was to drive up to Glenbrook, 50 miles from Reno. He was to establish legal Nevada residence by applying for a driver's license. He was not to leave the state for at least six weeks. At the end of six weeks instead of filing for divorce in Reno, Gilbert's Nevada affiliate, attorney William Coulthard would quietly file the complaint in Las Vegas. Maybe no one would discover it there.

Fat chance!

On October 4th, Clark Gable filed a divorce complaint against Sylvia Gable in Nevada, charging that, "the defendant has treated the plaintiff with extreme cruelty and has caused him great grievous mental suffering and pain without cause or provocation, and plaintiff's health was and is thereby and therefrom impaired."

When Lady Sylvia was served with a copy of the complaint she was enraged. The next day her lawyer, Jerry Giesler, one of the shrewdest attorneys in California, announced that the Nevada divorce would be fought by his client.

"In 1949," Giesler explained, "the California legislature passed a law forbidding one party to obtain a divorce in another state if he has been a bona fide resident of California for the preceding 12 months. If he does obtain such a divorce, he cannot return to California for 18 months."

The legality of this law has never been tested, and many attorneys say that Gable's divorce is legal as long as he maintains a legal residence in Nevada. (Recent reports however, indicate that this is not the case, and that Gable will not be allowed a Nevada divorce.)

While all this legal hasseling was going on, Giesler also announced that Sylvia Gable would amend the complaint she filed in Santa Monica last May, and would seek both a settlement and an annual share of Gable's income. He implied she would file a separate maintenance action.

"After all," explained one of Sylvia's friends, "I can't understand Gable at all. You can't marry a woman for 17 months and then throw her out of your house without making some provision for her support. I don't care how much money a girl has in her own right. According to Anglo-Saxon law, a husband is charged with support of his wife.

"This is no case of the wife having left the husband's bed and board. Gable had the locks changed on the Encino ranch house. Sylvia couldn't even get in.

"They may not have any children, but certainly after 17 months of marriage, she's entitled to something."

FRIENDS in Gable's camp say, "You have no idea how much money Sylvia cost the King. Did you see what she did to the ranch house? She tore out half an orchard and replaced it with a formal rose garden. She moved her own furniture into the main house, bought paintings and a TV set, had a separate guest cabana built, changed the whole works. It must have cost Gable more than $100,000."

To which Sylvia's crowd says, "So what? Of course, she improved his property. What dutiful wife doesn't? But it's still his property, isn't it? She didn't buy a million dollars' worth of jewels, or a big house for herself. All she did was make his place livable. In this country when you lock out your wife, you have to pay her something for services rendered. What does Gable want Sylvia to do, pay him for the privilege of having been married to him?"

When Sylvia's lawyer and Clark's lawyer got together in an effort to settle the mess, Gable's lawyer said that Sylvia's alimony demands, "were so unreasonable and exorbitant it was obvious no agreement could be reached."

The rumor was that Sylvia wanted a million dollars from Gable to be paid over a period of 10 years, $100,000 a year. In short she valued her 17 months of marriage to Gable at approximately $60,000 a month, figured in terms of cold cash.

How accurate this rumor was, no one could find out. Perhaps it was the first in an exchange of bargaining offers. Anyway, Gable's lawyer came right out and said that despite his client's movie income of $500,000 a year, Lady Sylvia had spent more than Gable had earned. How and on what Sylvia Gable had spent more than half a million dollars was a pretty huge mystery in Hollywood. It still is. Sylvia made many changes on Gable's property but even the highest estimate of these was around $250,000.

Anyway, when Sylvia's lawyer was confronted with this statement, he said, "It's haywire." He said that talks which had as their purpose an out-of-court settlement broke down when he asked to see Clark Gable's income tax returns. "We cannot accept a bald statement as to Mr. Gable's earnings that comes right out of thin air," Giesler said. "The usual thing in any divorce case is to inspect the joint income tax records, and Gable is no exception."

Gable's lawyer countered by saying that Mrs. Gable's attorney had been sent "an accurate statement" of Mr. Gable's financial affairs and status the previous week.

While all this fighting was going on, Gable discreetly remained in silence up in Nevada. He played golf, sun-bathed, began dating a few girls who were also in Nevada for divorce purposes. He took out Barbara Reed Josephy one night, and generally played the field.

He also spent his spare time looking over cattle ranches and announcing once again that he would make his legal residence in Nevada, and just commute to Hollywood for pictures.

By the time you read this, Gable should be starring opposite Ava Gardner in a comedy entitled, Sometimes I Love You.

It is also possible, though not probable, that he tried to persuade Sylvia not to contest his Nevada divorce, or to go through the motions of filing her own divorce, just as Nancy Sinatra did.

This doesn't seem probable now. The rumors are that Sylvia will ask for her divorce and then leave Hollywood for good, and move to Nassau.

And no matter what effort Gable makes to minimize the payment, his marriage to Sylvia is going to cost him. Sylvia Ashley is shrewd. When it comes to worldliness Gable isn't in the same league with her.

As far back as last September, Gable was advised to go easy on his divorce suit. Friends told him the notoriety would do him no good; that he'd have to hand over a good share of money in the end, if even for nothing but the legal fees. But the King was adamant. The marriage had cost him a fortune, and he was going to fight this through to the end. The way he felt, Sylvia didn't deserve more than the legal minimum, whatever that was. And the fight got under way.

In his long career Gable has faced divorce suits, a paternity suit, and various legal battles. Now that he's 50, all his friends say he's entitled to a little peace of mind.

The fact that he refused to take the easy way out, that he stubbornly chose to fight his way through a nasty divorce mess is certainly proof that he is still a man of courage, integrity, and fortitude.

Lady Sylvia should know better than to get "the big Dutchman" angry. When aroused, Gable is a terror, even in a court of law.

She had heard all sorts of stories. One was that Bob was leaving her in order to marry June Horne Cooper, ex-wife of the former child star, Jackie Cooper.

Another was that Bob was down at Newport sailing around the harbor on his boat and just wouldn't get in touch with her.

Added to this were the eye-opening reports from the private detective Lana's lawyers had hired to tail Topping.

Lana made many fruitless attempts to get in touch with Topping. She even tracked Drue Mallory down at a friend's house and asked where she might contact her husband. Drue didn't know a thing. Innocently, she had rented her house to a well-recommended stranger. Whether the stranger was a friend of Bob's and whether Bob was there, she didn't know.

Lana was upset. The next day she announced her separation from Topping. A few nights later she slipped in her shower, pushed her arm through the glass shower door, and was hospitalized midst false reports that she had attempted suicide.

It was following all this that Cy Howard came upon the scene.

As if to prove to the world that her marital breakup with Bob was just one of those things she could take in stride, and that those "suicide" stories were pure fiction, Lana had Cy take her to Ciro's. She wanted the public to see her acting gay and animated, as beautiful as ever, and as carefree.

The following night, Cy and Lana dined at Chasen's, one of Hollywood's most popular restaurants. Dave Chasen gave them a front booth so that no one could possibly miss seeing them. And there was Lana again, immaculately coiffured, stunningly dressed, listening to Cy talk—which he can do for long periods of time.

On Sunday evenings the "smart" thing to do in Hollywood is dine at Chasen's, so everyone was there. A constant stream of celebrities kept coming over to Lana's table and saying, "How are you, darling? You look wonderful." And Lana kept replying, "I never felt better in my life."

The following day, the gossip columns were loaded with Turner-Howard items. Lana believed she'd proved to the world that (a) her marital mishap with Topping hadn't gotten her down, and (b) she was back in circulation again.

Actually, Lana wasn't really fooling anyone. Bob Topping had deeply hurt her ego by getting himself mentioned with June Horne Cooper not only in Walter Winchell's column but in several others, too.

How would you feel if you were one of the most glamorous and beautiful motion picture stars in the world and your husband supposedly found you so dull that he preferred the society of other people?

If you were in Lana's shoes, you'd probably say to yourself, "I've been married four times, and all four marriages have failed. What's the matter with me, anyway? Either it's my fault, or all the men I pick for husbands are 14-karat jerks. Haven't I any ability to judge character?"

In an effort to get away from this sort of introspection, Lana began dating Cy.

Since Howard loves publicity, many people felt at first that it was all a publicity gimmick. It is no such thing. Lana Turner and Cy Howard need each other.

Both are basically insecure; both fear loneliness; both covet companionship.

Howard loves to be mentioned in connection with celebrities, and this may be a motivation for dating Lana. Previously, his name had been linked with Paulette Goddard's.

Although she hired a press agent a few months ago, Lana is not particularly publicity conscious. By nature generous and considerate, she has occasionally permitted her name to be used to foster the career of some rising young actor, as she did years ago with Peter Lawford. But she has never indulged in romance in order to become column material.

At this stage, her romance with Cy Howard is genuine. It is ego-restoring. Lana needs to feel desirable again.

What could be better than to have a handsome, wealthy, talented young-man-about-town pay court?

And that's what Cy Howard has been doing. After a few dates with Lana, Cy had to fly to New York. Everyone predicted he would continue on to Europe to see Paulette Goddard.

Howard didn't do anything of the kind. He phoned Lana in Holmby Hills practically every night from New York. He told her he was canceling his trip overseas and would fly back to see her.

She felt great. Maybe not as great as when Topping was courting her in New York back in 1947. But then again, Cy didn't have Topping's inherited wealth.

Bob's first gift to Lana in New York was a 15-karat diamond ring. "It was delivered," Lana recalls, "while I was weighing myself in the bathroom. The first thing I did was to put it on my finger and jump right back on the scale." Other gifts followed.

The jewelry was worth at least $50,000, and Lana felt, justifiably enough, that Topping thought the world of her. Why else would he spend a fortune to get rid of Arline Judge and another in gifts?

Lana married Bob Topping on the rebound. There's no doubt about that now. When Ty Power walked out on her to marry Linda Christian, Lana was ready for the rebound. But she did everything possible to make the marriage a success. There is conclusive legal evidence to substantiate the belief that its failure was not her fault.

What everyone is asking nowadays, however, is this: Will Lana Turner get married on the rebound again, this time to Cy Howard?

Lana has come a long way in wisdom from the night she eloped to Las Vegas with Artie Shaw.

Her divorce from Topping will be obtained in California; purposely, too. A California divorce imposes a year's wait before another marriage. During that year, Lana will have time to determine whether her romance with Cy is genuine or therapeutic.

It's Lana's nature to be married. She has been going with men for 16 of her 30 years. She's not the type for hen parties.

What is even more important, men like Lana. She's honest, forthright, and witty.

In the past Lana's husbands have turned out to be men who like to marry frequently.

Cy Howard has made the trek to the altar only once, with a cute night club singer, Nan Wynn, a few years ago. The marriage ended in divorce.

Howard's friends say that Cy is too self-centered to succeed at marriage.

If this is true, then he is not the boy for Lana. Here is one girl who is willing to devote all her time, all her love—her whole life—to a happy marriage.

To date, her batting average has been zero. Maybe Cy Howard will change all that.

THE END

(Continued from page 25) doing some quick estimating on the when and how of my future and when I finally answered, I said, "Well . . . in a couple of years I think."

This was the sort of romantic schedule I had for myself at 11. Figuring all that was then in my mind, I think I am running a bit slow. But, as I still tell myself (although I really know better) I had some unusual obstacles. For instance, at 14, I was convinced that my mother was conspiring to keep me from looking glamorous. I woke up to this awful realization when I developed a mad crush on a handsome boy in junior high who never even looked at me. The only way I could account for this was to blame my freckles, which my mother wouldn't let me cure with "miracle" drug store lotions, and my red hair which she insisted I wear in pigtails down to my waist. I accused her of wanting me to look like a freak.

It was not until school was almost over for the season that mother gave in to my "campaign" and let me cut my hair and have it fall naturally. Don't think this didn't do wonders for me, and don't think the boy didn't ask for a date. He did. But if I felt good about this, I knew from nothing otherwise. I squeeked out a tiny, "Hello," when he called for me and an even fainter, "Goodbye," when he brought me home. In between we didn't speak or even look at each other. What a failure!

For the first time in my life I seriously sought advice . . . and of all things from my fellow 'teen-agers. They said I should have been more animated. They said he probably wanted to kiss me. They said he might try the next time, if he dated me again, and I should let him.

We went out once more. He tried. I let him. And he never asked me out again!

Maybe it sounds funny, but I think I have been years building up what this tore down in me! Everything that happens to you is supposed to have some character effect, so though I am still a romantic at 19, I'm a romantic with her guard up. I console myself by thinking that I'm not the only girl who will go to her grave, probably, with a question mark in her heart like this one. And, of course, I don't hate all men any more, as I did for weeks and weeks after this monster left me flat. But it shows you what a girl is up against. Seriously, you can't always figure a man out. I mean even in a rough way. And this is what makes everything so much more confusing.

THERE is a man in Hollywood who I once thought was the most terrible specimen on two feet. I formed this opinion after I met him away from town on a personal appearance tour, and he acted in a way I considered horrible. He was in one group of people, and I in another, when we all came together at a party and got introduced around. People were drifting in and out of the room, and there came a few minutes when he and I were alone. Suddenly he stepped completely out of the character and became rude and sarcastic. In seconds, it seemed to me, we had gone from mutual politeness to sharp words. I had never had to express myself in this way before in my life, and that such a thing could happen so quickly between two supposedly cultured persons sickened me more, I think, then the personal insult involved.

If ever I was sure of anything, after this, it was that he was a worthless fellow. That sort of demonstration was a safe thing to go by, I felt. Then, much later and back in Hollywood, a surprising thing happened. I saw this same man do a fine thing . . . give up something valuable which he could have had for the asking to someone who needed it more than he. And I came to know about it quite accidentally, there was no talk or word from him. I decided, nevertheless, not to let it affect me, but the next time we met I found that it had. Somehow I was able to talk to him long enough to let him get in a few words of apology. They were ordinary words, but I found myself liking the way he said them. I liked it well enough so that on the next occasion when we met we talked longer. Since then we have met a number of times—they were dates—and I eventually got the answer to the puzzle of his original behavior. My Dr. Jekyll had acted like Mr. Hyde at our first meeting for the same reason I have done things that were not really like me. He, too, was unsure of himself!

This makes things really complicated. For a while you labor under the delusion that certainly men know what they are doing . . . at least, what kind of men they want to be. And then you find out that they are no better off than you are! When I first learned this, I thought it was downright unfair, that there is enough of a horrible indecision in a woman's life without her having to worry about this as well! Believe me, or maybe you know it already, but that last wolf you were out with may not have wanted to be a wolf at all! He was just trying out the role for size. The next time you see him he may make a perfect big brother!

OF course you know what this means. This means a girl just can't make snap judgments about men. Or at least this is what it has meant to me. If I like something about a fellow, who otherwise is just not there, I tell myself I must wait and see.

I don't go out much. Not by Hollywood standards anyway. In the past two years I have gone out less than 50 times, I am sure. Is this a mistake? Oh, yes, say a lot of my friends. A girl is supposed to go out where she can be seen. The more you go out and the more you are seen, why, the more "chances" they point out. What to do? Because I seem to be against this. For me, going out can often get to be unpleasant since it is obvious that if you go out often you are not going out with someone you love to be with constantly. If you had someone like this, you wouldn't need to go out. So you have to spend a lot of evenings in the company of people you are indifferent about.

Isn't this practice unfair to them as well as yourself?

I asked my mother. A girl is supposed to ask her mother. But mine doesn't like to give specific advice, unless she feels I really need it. Instead she asks me to think it out first and then helps me. Mother will go so far sometimes as to tell me what she would do in such and such a situation.

I told her once about being in a car with a boy when he got out of line. Here we were, miles out of town, and he wasn't fun any longer—he was trouble. Yet I wasn't really frightened for myself, I told her. I was frightened for both of us . . . hoping fervently that things wouldn't end up plain ugly. And I asked her what she would have done.

"What did you do?" she wanted to know first.

I told her. What I did was to start laughing. I don't know why, but I did. And after a few moments of indecision the boy had to laugh too, and somehow the situation lightened right up. Not only that, but he seemed grateful about it.

Another reason I don't go out too much is that I'd hate to fall into the habit of going out just to go out. There is a girl I know who used to do just that.

It got so that the headwaiter at Ciro's jokingly made out an employee's time-card for her so she could punch the clock when she came in every night.

One day, about a year ago, she got a call from a visitor from New York who told her that a mutual friend from Chicago had suggested he phone her for a date. They went out, and six months later the Chicago friend was in town and invited her to a dinner party. Seated across the table from her was a man who spoke to her as if he knew her. Later they got together and he proved to be the New Yorker she had been out with. She could recall where they had been that night, and what they had talked about to some extent. But she couldn't remember him. It wasn't because the man was colorless or a nonentity, she told me later. It was simply because she had been going out so often and with so many men that they had all merged into one figure . . . a sort of shadowy phantom who called for her, said the usual things, performed the customary services of an escort, and then vanished from her life.

"What a waste of time!" I had to say.

"Yes, and a waste of men," she agreed, thoughtfully. "A whole stream of them in my life, and not one who means more than another. There must be a better way."

Now another girl told me that I should go out only with important men. This, I learned, is a complete mistake. One of the worst nights I ever spent was in the company of such a man. He asked me for the date, I was advised to accept, and it was the first time I had ever been to Romanoff's. We also went to a private party and we wound up at the Mocambo. It was all for nothing. In the first place we couldn't meet on a conversational level, and in the second place he was too well-known to be allowed to give me any time.

We no sooner got to Romanoff's than a half dozen other couples who knew him plumped themselves down all around us at the table and from that moment on were permanent attachments. The flow of talk was the cheapest kind of personal prattle . . . the kind that is full of big, extravagant phrases but means nothing. I didn't speak 20 words to my escort. I felt like an ornament, not his date, and the worst of it was that I didn't know how to get out of it. Now I know. Don't go in the first place.

I have enjoyed myself more with a boy I met at dramatic school who couldn't even afford to buy me a hamburger.

For six months Vic Damone and I dated now and then, and only once went to a night club. We cooked at each other's homes. We tried to analyze and understand world affairs as well as show affairs. And once I baked him a chocolate cake that he kept eating for weeks—until it began to turn green, in fact. But we knew right from the start we were to be friends only.

A girl I work with says the best plan is to pitch yourself into your career and forget boys. Then, the first thing you know, someone interesting will show up. "What's to be will be," she assures me.

I start to think that way, too; then another friend says something that sounds just as wise. "A girl can always concentrate on her work if she wants to," this one tells me, "but you have only so many golden years and that's the time to go places, keep your eyes open, and make your bid."

How can two pieces of advice, with such opposite meanings, both sound so right? And which of the following contrasting viewpoints should you pick to guide you?

"Don't set your standards too high," I was told once. "After all, men are only human."

This sounded very good until I heard, "Never waste a second on a man who doesn't show high character. If he hasn't got that, he hasn't anything!"

At this minute, when we are starting my latest picture, Oh, Money! Money! there is a new man in my life. I don't know his name. Ever since the production began he has been sending flowers but no card. I am flattered. When he does show up, and if he is nice, it might be the beginning of something. And then again . . . who knows better than I that it might be the beginning of nothing? Where does this leave me? You said it. It sure is a problem! THE END

Debbie was a half-grade ahead of me, being three months older, and I first saw her in gym class when we were both 15. She stood out like a diamond in a trash can there, for three reasons. First, she was so darned good at sports—she could shinny up the ropes like a sailor and was so fast on the rings and bars that you couldn't keep track of what she was actually doing. Secondly, there was that Reynolds personality, a peppiness that makes her a standout in any crowd; and thirdly, the fact that she always looked so neat. I guess you could take the world's most beautiful female and put her in a gym suit, and you'd have a big blob of nothing, but Debbie always looked as though she'd stepped out of the pages of a fashion magazine.

Anyway, there we were, and because I was the average type of girl who went to parties with boys, Debbie and I didn't get any closer than greeting each other. That was before I met Bill Reynolds, Debbie's brother. He and I had mutual girl friends, and it was only natural that we'd get around to each other. When we did, I fell for the Reynolds personality and pretty soon knew that one day I'd have Debbie for a sister-in-law.

IT WAS a week after I met Bill that I had my first and only white rage at Debbie. The "Queen of Burbank Contest" was to be held on a night when I had my second date with Bill, a coincidence which was my Waterloo. Just when I'd finished dressing and had every curl in place, William phoned me with the bad news.

"I'm sorry, but I can't make it tonight," he told me.

"What?" I howled. "Why not?"

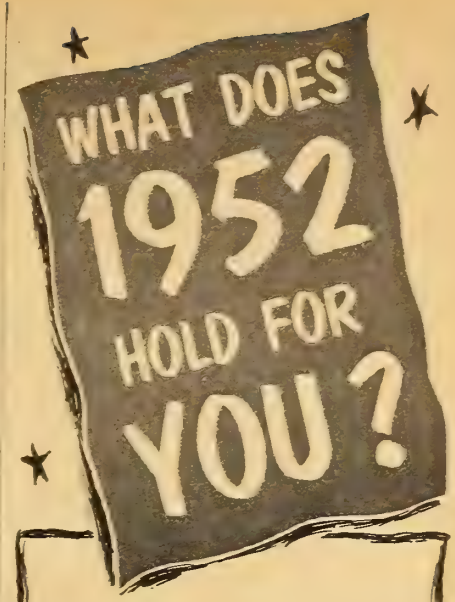
"It's my kid sister," he said. "She's in some sort of a contest, and my parents say I have to be down there at the Burbank something-or-other to watch over her."



Debbie turned out to be the winner, and came home with her blue ribbons and my date, much too late for me to join him even for a hamburger at Bob's.

From then on, things really started popping for Debbie, but I was so shot through with butterflies that I don't suppose I paid much attention. Neither did Bill, for that matter, or anyone else in the gang. Debbie was still just "Bill's kid sister," and any of his friends who might have suggested that she accompany him to a dance had been so thoroughly rebuffed that they didn't ask a second time. No one was aware that she was shooting up to be a star. Bill would mention once in a while that he'd been over at Warners watching Debbie on a set, but nobody thought anything would come of it. Least of all Debbie herself, I guess. Concerning the screen test that resulted from the contest, her attitude was strictly nonchalant. "They'll give me the test and that'll be all there is to it. They have to do it—they promised it to the winner, and they're stuck."

It turned out that Debbie was stuck, instead, for what she had begun as a pure lark turned out to be a mighty interesting venture. She didn't talk much about it in those days, but we knew she was a goner because she didn't, for the first time in her life, complain about getting up early in the morning. Debbie has always remained in the hay as long as possible, and could sleep through an earthquake. These days, when she's working, she gets up at six in the morning and leaves the house by six-twenty, thereby establishing some sort of speed record. When she isn't working she stays in bed for hours, reading books or listening to Judy Garland recordings (she thinks Judy is the absolute end when it comes to talent), and making up in general for the sleep she lost when working.

Bill and I were married a year ago, and Debbie was at the wedding, bouncing all over the place as though she were attending a football game. I think she was fascinated only because in her eyes it was another activity, and one which she figured she might tackle herself some day.

When Bill went into the army last January and left for Camp Roberts, I went to live with Debbie and her parents, whom I call Maxene and Ray, at their request. It was the first time I had had an opportunity to really know Debbie, for Bill and I had continued to go around with our own crowd. Debbie didn't approve of said crowd, but then none of us had the talent for tooting a horn with the Burbank Youth Symphony Orchestra, or singing with the Choral Society, or marching with the Batoneers, or starting a fire with two sticks of wood—much less the executive capacity for running a half-dozen organizations around town.

As a matter of fact, I guess Debbie didn't approve of me, but if that was the case I'm sure she's changed her mind, for I've been living a year under the same roof and get along with her better than Bill does. He and Debbie have had the same relationship as most brother-and-sister acts. She's two years younger than he, and as a result was always tagging around after him when they were kids. Bill used to wish that Debbie would get interested in dolls and keep off the sandlot when he was trying to pitch a tight game. It soon got to the point where he ceased paying any attention to her at all, and this detached state of affairs went on for years until they grew up and each suddenly discovered that the other wasn't half bad, as people go.

Only one subject remained a sore point with them, and that was Debbie's disapproval of Bill's girl friends (before I got into the act, of course).

"For the life of me," she used to say, "I can't see what you see in her."

"Who's asking you?" Bill would growl.

If Debbie had gone with any boy in particular, Bill could have come back at her with his own criticism, but the event wasn't forthcoming. He'd ask Maxene, "Mom, why doesn't Franny get serious about some guy?" And Maxene would answer, "Give her time, she has a lot of it. And when she does fall in love it will be for keeps."

DEBBIE and I now disagree on only one thing, and that's potato salad. She likes it with dill pickles and I prefer sweet; and when poor Maxene is trying to concoct a dish, she has Debbie over one shoulder and me over the other, touting for our favorite pickles.

There's one thing about living in the same house with Debbie—you always know she's there. When she comes home she drives her car into the driveway, comes to a squealing stop, slams the door and yells at the top of her voice, "I'm ho-ome!" As if we didn't already know.

It's impossible for Debbie to be quiet. She even talks in her sleep, and the only time her mouth stays closed for any length of time is when she's attending a movie. Movies charm her right out of her shoes—any kind of movies—and she sits there spellbound through the whole thing. Except that she makes up for it by munching popcorn with great gusto.

I've always loved clothes, but I guess I'll never equal my sister-in-law. With her contract safely signed, she had one wall of her bedroom knocked out and lined with an immense closet. Even with the original closet still available, things spill out into the room and it never manages to look tidy. Debbie herself is no help, for when she's going out, even if it's only for bowling with some girl friends, she'll put on six or seven complete outfits before feeling that she's appropriately rigged. By the time she's decided, there's no time to put away the discarded clothes, and Maxene says she's going to make a recording (long playing) that says nothing but, "Put your things away. Put your things away."

Debbie isn't home very much these days. When she isn't working she's off on some tour, and often does camp shows for the boys in service. She knocks herself out on these occasions, and her favorite is Travis Air Base near San Francisco, where they bring in the wounded evacuees from Korea. A person just can't keep up this pace all the time, and many a night Debbie is obviously tired. We know she's tired when she tries to sneak into bed without having dinner. Debbie has erratic eating habits, and sometimes skips whole meals because she claims she hasn't time to eat. If it weren't for milk, she'd starve to death. She drinks milk as soon as she's out of bed, and all day long, finishing off with another glass before she gets back in bed.

When she isn't tired, we're in for a ball, because Debbie is a clown at heart and puts on impromptu acts as long as she's vertical. She sings a lot around the house, in a voice ranging from a crazy falsetto to a strained bass, and while she used to render "Abba-Dabba Honeymoon" at least once a day, I think she's finally grown tired of it. The boys at the camps always request it, and despite the fact it's the song that helped make her famous, you can like one tune just so long. The only thing that's left for Debbie out of that one is her fondness for monkeys. At this point she is waging a campaign to bring a live one home, and Maxene is resisting with all the fortifications that a mother can put forth. When Debbie has run out of arguments, she brings up the dubious point that the animal would make a good pet for Gail, the baby born to Bill and me last September. The argument doesn't carry much weight, for at this early age Gail wouldn't know a monkey from her own mother. I don't think.

The advent of Gail was a thing that Debbie looked forward to with great anticipation. Such anticipation that when I told her about it last spring, she was crushed by the information that she would have to wait until the middle of August. "Well, hurry up," she said. "Isn't there something you can do about it?" When August had come and gone and we discovered that we'd figured wrong and wouldn't have the baby until mid-September, Debbie gave up the whole project in utter disbelief that she would ever be an aunt. As it happened, Gail was born on a Friday afternoon while Debbie was at the studio making Singin' In The Rain. She didn't know about it until she came home at eight that night, and was in a big twit because she had to leave the next morning for an air base in Omaha. When she and Gail and I finally came home where we belonged, Debbie was very polite about the fact that the baby was a girl. With all those uncles and fond memories of tetherball, etc., she had been all set for a nephew, but the disappointment didn't last long. By this time, when Maxene is doing the dishes and I'm mixing the formula, Gail is given into the care of Debbie, who promptly snatches her up and goes into anything ranging from ballet to jitterbugging, a jouncing pastime which delights the baby.

I'm happy that my daughter and sister-in-law get along so well, particularly in view of the fact that Gail has done her darndest to draw Debbie's dislike. For two solid months the baby was afflicted with colic, and it seemed she made a point of howling the minute Debbie got up to go to work. She quieted down as soon as Debbie left the house, then started up again in the evening when she heard her aunt's car screech into the driveway. Debbie has forgiven her all this, but I notice a change in her attitude toward babies. She likes children and always has, figuring that six would make a likely brood. But lately, between the colic and the two-hour feeding schedule that disrupted the entire house, Debbie has given some brief thought to adopting all six when they are safely out of the infant stage.

In the meantime, all she has to worry about is this career business. She still doesn't believe it, and dreams of going to college so that she can be qualified as a gym teacher and have something to fall back on when "all this glamor routine blows over." I don't think it's going to blow over, and all you have to do is look at Debbie to know that. It's amazing how she's perked up since beginning her movie work. When I first knew her she wore no makeup except a little lipstick, and now, while she doesn't go into complications about cosmetics, she looks so much prettier. She was always neat, but these days—well, it sort of stuns me when I think of it, but I do believe Debbie is getting to be glamorous. I guess the thought would stun her, too, but it's the truth. It isn't anything she works at—it's just beginning to steal over her, that's all.

I suppose the family first realized it when that strange boy began hanging around the house. Seems he'd seen her in a movie and fallen in love with her. Our phone number was still listed in the book, and after calling up all the Reynolds in Los Angeles, he struck our house, copied the address and came around the next night. Nobody was home but Ray, who invited the boy in to watch television. After that, he showed up wherever Deb happened to be, and that included crashing the studio. He was a nice enough kid, but Debbie doesn't have enough time to devote to her old friends, let alone new ones, and finally had to ask him to stay in his own bailiwick.

Next thing we knew she received a letter from an old friend of Bill's, now in the army, and although he'd always known her as Franny, the kid sister, the letter was addressed most respectfully to Miss Debbie Reynolds. And not long after that another army friend of Bill's, who years ago hadn't even bothered to speak to Debbie, stopped by when on leave to ask her for an autographed picture.

Well, things are happening all right, and the prize square of John Burroughs High is turning into a social circle all by herself. And as glamorous females seldom choose a career of drilling schoolchildren in their exercises, I very much doubt that a gymnasium will ever see Mary Frances Reynolds again. Instead, Debbie Reynolds will be confining her appearances to the silver screens of the nation.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When Vic Damone was playing a singing engagement in Cleveland, there was a little girl in the audience who was so smitten with him that she kept trying to make her way up the steps leading to the stage, much to the amusement of the audience.

Apparently Vic noticed her too, for in the middle of one of his numbers, he suddenly stopped singing and walked off the stage, picked up the little girl in his arms, carried her onto the stage and finished singing the song directly to her.

Sue Ladd is not as hasty in decisions or conclusions as Alan. As a matter of fact, she was quite horrified when she learned that Alan had committed himself to buy the property without a good deal more investigation into the value of the land and the horse-raising business. However, there'd been a handshake on the deal, and they were stuck with it, so they set about trying to make a success of their new enterprise.

The development of the ALSULANA ACRES was a long, dreary process. In the initial fervor of acquiring the place, Alan hadn't given a thought to water or electricity. There was a well, but the windmill which pumped it must have been the one that had had a tiff with Don Quixote, for it was in a miserable state of disrepair. Alan spent days climbing the rigging, adjusting the vanes, cleansing the pipe, filtering water, and doing a thousand other mechanical chores. Finally, he had sufficient water flowing into a small cement reservoir to supply drink for the few head of horses they had immediately purchased, and to irrigate some of the grazing land. He learned that it would cost him a fortune to get electric power into the site, but there was nothing he could do about it. And the scope of the farm terrified him.

"I never realized," he said, "how big an area 25 acres was until I had to water and farm it. I used to lie in bed at night and dream it was bigger than Texas."

The first year, of course, was the hardest. The stables had to be converted into a home. This was done one two-stall compartment at a time. The compartments were thoroughly cleaned, new board flooring was put in, the rooms fumigated and painted, decorated tastefully, and furnished in a homely motif. Then another one went through the routine, until it became possible for the Ladds to take their family to the ranch on week-ends and give the kids a little exercise while they worked. The living room was formerly the quarters assigned to the storing of tack and equipment. A flagstone extension was added on the front which gave the room a semblance of size, and if you have seen the pictures of this room, you know that it was decorated beautifully like an Early American country farm house. The Ladds found it necessary to build another small extension onto the main room for kitchen equipment. They installed stoves, and icebox and sink in this section.

There were many amusing incidents relative to the development of the Ladd ranch. For instance, there was the time that Alan, begging his business manager for more pipe to be used in irrigation, was told the investment couldn't be made at that time. But a short while later, at Christmas, a big truck drove up to the ranch loaded with iron pipe, a huge red ribbon tied around it and a pretty card bearing the inscription: "Merry Christmas to Alan from Sue." He says it was one of the nicest Christmas presents he ever got.

Then there was the present of the blooded mare, which Sue presented her husband on Father's Day—purchased, of course, out of the ALSULANA Retirement Fund.

Sue had the mare brought out to the ranch shortly after they took it over. The animal was in foal and was to be the first forebear of a long line of Ladd-bred race horses. Alan was so delighted with his prize, that when he and Sue decided to go for a ride across the country that evening, he suggested they take the beast along, led by a halter. Things went beautifully until they were seven or eight miles away from home, at which time the mare bolted, snapped the halter, and took off like Seabiscuit into the gathering dusk. Alan spurred his horse and went after the animal like a regular cowboy. Sue, of little use in this situation, returned to the ranch to wait for him. At four o'clock the next morning, after six solid hours in the saddle, Alan came home admitting that he was not the greatest horse herder in the world after dark. Sue set about giving him something to eat, only to learn that both the water and electricity had failed. They sat in their darkened converted stable in the flickering light of a small candle bemoaning the fate of amateur ranchers.

"If anyone had come along right then," Alan said, "he could have bought the whole outfit for a two bit piece with a hole in it."

It was no great comfort to either of them when they learned the next morning that Alan had, without knowing it, herded the horse into an enclosed pasture, and that he had been chasing it around in this confine for the better part of the night.

The same animal was also responsible for another sleepless night at the Ladd ranch without warning, and at a very inconvenient hour, the mare decided to present her new owners with their first filly. There was no telephone on the property and the birth appeared to be so imminent that Alan decided there was no time to go looking for a vet. Fate appointed him an equine obstetrician.

"It was the funniest thing you ever saw," said Sue. "Alan was a combination horse doctor and father, and he ran around like a demented person trying to see that the foal came along all right and looking for sympathy from me."

Actually there was more to it than that. The mare was the basis of their breeding stock, had cost them a pretty penny, and could have put them firmly in the red at the outset, if anything had gone wrong.

ALAN got himself into quite a situation with Warner Brothers—his new bosses, by the way, during the early days of building the ranch. He was leveling ground, using bulldozers and tractors, when a Warner company began shooting outdoor scenes for Stallion Road right across from his property. Shortly after the shooting started, a production manager from the movie troupe walked over to Alan's property and asked him if he would mind shutting off the tractors and the other gasoline equipment. Alan informed him that it would be impossible. The men and equipment were costing him a pretty penny an hour and he couldn't afford to shut them down just so somebody could make an old movie. The man left, but in a little while he came back with the producer and director of the picture.

"See here, Alan," they said, "you're in the picture business. You know what our problem is. We can't shoot with all that racket going on."

"I know," said Alan, "but right now you're talking to Alan Ladd, rancher and racehorse breeder, and I just can't shut down my work with all these men here at your convenience. Why don't you come back and shoot some day when we're doing something quiet, like hoeing?"

It was all worked out amicably, though. The studio installed a series of flagmen between the camera and Alan's foreman, and when a scene was about to be shot, the flagmen would signal one another by lowering their pennants, and Alan and his crew would stand quietly by until the scene was finished. The studio had agreed to pay Alan for the time his men were forced to be idle. So an impartial party kept track of the minutes on a stop watch.

"It didn't do much good, though," said Alan. "I think I got about six bucks."

Another amusing incident was the gift to the ALSULANA organization of a deep freeze by a friend who admired the Ladds' spunk. Alan set the box up on a cement platform, tickled pink at the idea he had got something for nothing. The first rainfall, however, proved to him that it was necessary to put a roof over the box, which he did. And then a wind came up. This necessitated the erection of walls, and before Alan got through, the "house" to shelter his gift icebox had cost him more than if he had bought the thing himself.

It would be nice to say at this point that the almost six years the Ladds have put into the ALSULANA ACRES have been prosperous and profitable—but that is not true. One of the reasons is that some of the horses Alan and Sue have produced haven't run as fast as they were supposed to. Another is that people just don't seem to be spending much more than $150 for thoroughbred yearlings, whereas breeding fees, veterinary assistance, and feed cost more than that before the horse is a few months old. However, the Ladds are in so deep now that it would be impossible for them to get out without taking a serious loss and, oddly enough, they are still convinced that the ranch will pay off. At the moment they are concentrating on the raising of a small herd of Black Angus cattle and are installing good-sized structures to be used as chicken coops so that they can go into the egg and poultry business.

A typical day on the ranchland goes like this:

Alan, Sue and the kids leave home about five o'clock in the morning, and drive 45 miles to the ranch. They are greeted by Sturge, their foreman, who has their activities outlined for them. The whole family, including Sue and the kids, get into dungarees and set to work feeding chickens and gathering eggs. When this is completed, they go into the barn where the eggs are sorted, washed and crated, and placed on a truck to be shipped to the market. After a hasty lunch, the gang pitches in for mending fences, stringing wire, repairing the considerable electrical and gasoline gadgets used on the land. Then comes feeding time for the chickens, hogs, cattle and horses and after that dinner. While it is still light, Alan and Sturge go up on a small hill, where they are building a workmen's house with their own hands, and labor until they feel it is time to go to bed.

There are moments of fun, however, at ALSULANA ACRES. There is the fresh air and the clean smells and the knowledge that they are working in their own earth. There is the sense of accomplishing something from personal toil. There are the happy, friendly gabfests around the fire at night, when everyone is relaxed and yawning. There are the quick dips in the irrigation reservoir, when the family plays like kids at a new swimming hole. And there are the moments at sunset when Alan and Sue stand in their own doorway and look across their fields with their arms around one another and Alan kisses Sue on the cheek and says:

"Honey, you sorry I delivered that desk?"

And Sue looks up at him and thinks of all the fun it has been and says:

"No, darling. I've never been sorry for a minute."

STARLIFT

This is the Hollywood Canteen of the Korean war. Only instead of staying home, movie stars hop aboard government supplied airplanes and swoop off to entertain the boys at a nearby air-base. They sing, they dance, they tell funny stories. They wave goodbye to the kids on the way over, and "Hi" to those who are coming home. Everybody who is anybody on the Warners lot puts in an appearance somewhere. The musical numbers are swell for the most part. The only dud is a huge production number featuring Phil Harris and wasting Gary Cooper who manages to get a line in now and then. There's a love story, too. Soldier meets home town girl turned movie star. They romance; they rift, they're brought together by a General. But never mind the story. It's the spirit that counts. And that's good!

Cast: Doris Day, Janice Rule, Ruth Roman, Ron Haggerthy.—Warners.

MY FAVORITE SPY

If you were the United States government, and you had to trust somebody to be transported to Tangier with one million dollars for the purchase of microfilm, would you pick Bob Hope? Neither would the U. S. government. That's its predicament. An international spy who looks exactly like Bob is on his way to this microfilm when he's shot by FBI men, and the poor government is forced to take a chance on shipping lily-livered burlesque comic Hope to Tangier, with a prayer that he can get to the secret film before anybody figures out his real identity. Government agents try to train Bob to act suave and romantic, but he's crying on the inside, let me tell you. In Tangier, ensues a spy story, complete with gorgeous Hedy Lamarr, and menacing Francis L. Sullivan. The whole thing is a riot.

Cast: Bob Hope, Hedy Lamarr, Francis L. Sullivan.—Paramount.

THE LADY SAYS NO

"Life" photographer David Niven sets out to do a story on—and incidentally reform—Joan Caulfield, the writer of a best-seller on why women are better off without men. Does this sound familiar? I wish I could tell you that he—Niven—fails miserably; that she—Joan—maintains her convictions; and that the picture at least has a surprise ending, but I can't. She—Joan—slings her book into the sea, and collapses into his—Niven's—arms in a perfectly routine and suggestive way. (She archly informs him that she wants to learn 28 ways to say yes, and she'll never say no no more.) One of the most idiotic scripts in years is livened up by a number of really good comic characterizations, and the one I liked best was turned in by Lenore Lonergan, as the warm-blooded wife of an army sergeant.

Cast: Joan Caulfield, David Niven, James Robertson Justice.—United Artists.

LET'S MAKE IT LEGAL

As a fine figger of a grandmother, Claudette Colbert romps around having more fun. She's in the process of divorcing her husband of 20 years (Macdonald Carey) because for 20 years he's been gambling, and she's had enough. Horses, dice, poker—you name it, and Carey'll indulge in it. Their grown-up married daughter is dismayed by the divorce, while their son-in-law is anxious for Claudette to re-marry, so that he can move out on his own with his wife and baby, instead of sharing Claudette's home. Along comes millionaire Zachary Scott who's up for some terrific Washington diplomatic post, and who, incidentally, was once Claudette's best beau. He woos her, she wins him, but champagne, and moonlight and dreams of the Riviera notwithstanding, it's hard to believe Claudette will go through with her second marriage. After all, there's that loathsome 20-year-man of hers, and you can't take 20 loathsome years lightly. Highly unbelievable, but amusing in spots.

Cast: Claudette Colbert, Macdonald Carey, Zachary Scott.—20th Century-Fox.

MEET DANNY WILSON

Meet Danny Wilson is the story of a young singer (Frankie) and his piano player-bodyguard pal (Alex Nicol) who rise to the bigtime via the efforts of a girl (Shelley Winters and her gangster boss). There's a love triangle, and some shooting-it-up-with-the-mob-boys stuff, but the thing that's most enjoyable is the way the movie parallels certain events in Frankie's real life story, for nostalgic kicks. He sings some of his best old numbers ("All of Me," "She's Funny That Way"), there are scenes of him being swooned over and mobbed at the Paramount and wherever he goes. The acting is fresh and easy—Alex Nicol being particularly attractive—and the scenes of New York and Hollywood life have a nice reality you don't often find in movies. I enjoyed Meet Danny Wilson. You're going to like it, too.

Cast: Frank Sinatra, Shelley Winters, Alex Nicol.—Universal-International.

WAS GRANDPA CORNY?

When I was young, grandpa was so embarrassing...

If anyone questioned his pet brands, he'd take it as a personal insult.

Once, when an old crony made some slurring remarks about grandpa's favorite brand of pipe tobacco, he refused to speak to the man for two years.

But he was most embarrassing about that car of his. He'd bought it back in 1919... and from that day on, he took full credit for everything about it.

Whenever he saw another car of the same make, he'd go up to the owner like the fellow was a long-lost brother. He'd button-hole perfect strangers, and practically kiss 'em!

To a small boy it was agony... could anything be cornier?

As I grew older, I began to see that having brand names you could look for and trust, wasn't a bad idea at that.

Maybe it is "corny" to think of familiar brands as old friends...

But it's good to know exactly what you're getting. It's reassuring to realize that most manufacturers of brand name products spend money for research and quality control to make their brands live up to their name.

They know the best way to make money is to make friends!

Every day thousands of these brands are fiercely competing for your friendship... trying to give you more and more value and quality.

If value, and better products, and better living are "corn," let's have more of it.

As you study the ads in these pages, remember... brand names are names of friends you can count on!

Whenever you buy—

Q. Does Joan Crawford have a family, I mean any sisters or brothers? If so, why don't we ever hear of them?
—T. T., New York, N. Y.

A. Joan has a mother and brother who live in Los Angeles under the family name of Le Seuer. They see Joan frequently, but don't like to take part in her professional life and therefore don't want any publicity.

Q. I understand that Gary Cooper and Pat Neal plan to marry sometime this year. When do you think the wedding will take place? —B. N., Chicago, Ill.

A. The wedding will probably never take place. By the time you read this, Gary and Rocky Cooper should be reconciled. Coop was quite taken with Pat but he is 22 years older than she and didn't feel a happy marriage was in the cards for them.

Q. Is it true that Audie Murphy's best friend had Audie's salary attached because the actor wouldn't pay his debts?
—F. T., Dallas, Texas

A. Murphy always pays his bills. Until he signed a contract with Universal a few months ago at $1,000 a week, his finances were in a very muddled state. However, they are all straightened out and his salary is not under attachment.

Q. When the Jack Benny troupe hits the road, how come Rochester stays in hotels which ordinarily permit no Negro guests? —G. F., Marion, S. C.

A. Jack Benny will not stay in any hotel which does not welcome all the members of his cast regardless of race, color, or creed.

Q. Now that she's proved such a big success in vaudeville, isn't Judy Garland a cinch to return to Metro and Hollywood? —B S., Philadelphia, Pa.

A. No. She may return to Hollywood eventually, but it is highly doubtful if she will return to Metro.

Q. Isn't Jane Powell pregnant again? Isn't that why she collapsed while making a personal appearance in Cleveland?
—A. W., Shaker Heights, Ohio

A. She collapsed because of nervous exhaustion, after doing five shows a day for 14 consecutive days.

Q. Our local newspaper carries a daily humor column by Bob Hope. Does Hope write this himself?
—V. F., Los Angeles, Cal.

A. Bob has a staff of six gag-writers. Each takes a weekly turn at the column.

Q. How was Rex Harrison treated when he returned to Hollywood a few months ago after making all those blasts about the film capital?

A. He was treated coldly in many circles, which is understandable since Harrison was so outspoken in his criticism.

Q. A little while ago I read that Dan Dailey was going to marry Jane Nigh. Is this true? —V. C., Toronto, Can.

A. He may marry Jane eventually, but as of this writing, Dailey hasn't proposed. He has said that he will not get married for at least two more years.

Q. Do most big stars have script approval? If they don't want to act in a certain story, must they?
—B. B., Tulsa, Okla.

A. They don't have script approval, for the most part. They don't have to act in a story they don't like, but their studio may put them on suspension.

Q. Janie Powell and Elizabeth Taylor were both married in the Church of the Good Shepherd in Beverly Hills, which is Catholic. Aren't both of these girls Protestants or were they converted?
—T. E., Pawtucket, R. I.

A. They are still Protestant.

Q. How come Kirk Douglas' real name has been given as Isadore Danielovitch, Izzy Dempster, and Irving Daniels? Which is the correct one?
—Y. C., Amsterdam, N. Y.

A. The first.

Q. Is it true that Gene Kelly wants to stop dancing and become a director instead? —A. G., San Francisco, Cal.

A. Kelly is already a director. He plans to continue dancing as long as his legs and stamina hold out. Probably another 20 years.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

Gene Kelly and his wife, Betsy Blair, arrive at the premiere of Gene's latest movie, An American In Paris. This MGM super-musical may win the "best picture" Academy Award for 1951. Gene's already planning a new ballet-conscious film.

LANA, THAT ONE-MAN WOMAN, IS AFLAME ABOUT FERNANDO LAMAS . . . AVA GARDNER WANTS TO BE A MOTHER RIGHT

I HAVE a strong, strong, strong hunch that Elizabeth Taylor and Michael Wilding will be married in January.

When Elizabeth came back from London I wouldn't have given you a plugged nickel for her romance with the good-looking English actor who just seems to "kill" the ladies—including Marlene Dietrich.

After her arrival in New York, when Liz thought her romance with Wilding had hit the skids, she beckoned to Nicky Hilton to come back despite Nick's supposed engagement to Betsy Von Furstenberg.

Liz and Nicky met in her hotel suite, visited with her uncle, Howard Taylor, in Connecticut and a reconciliation MIGHT have been effected if word hadn't come that after many years of marriage Wilding's wife, Kay Young, was divorcing him behind closed doors in London. That ended the reconciliation with Nicky where Liz was concerned.

If there was a chance of her getting Wilding, she didn't want anybody else. That's how hard our gal had tumbled for him in London.

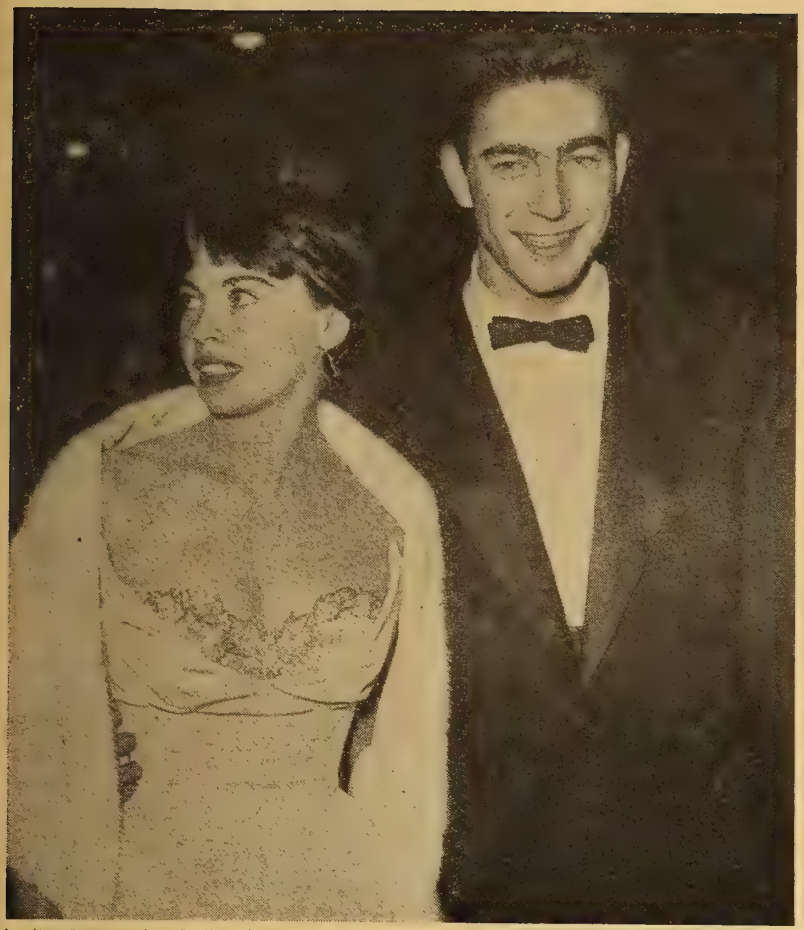
Right on the heels of his divorce, Wilding arrived in New York. Oddly—or perhaps it isn't too odd—his first visit was to his old flame, Marlene Dietrich. It was also his last visit. Could it be that Mike, the perfect gentleman, had bade farewell to his former love before devoting himself to the new love?

Anyway, at this writing, Liz and the devastating Britisher are terrifically in love and something tells me it will be a wedding.

Their ages? Liz is 19. Mike is 39.

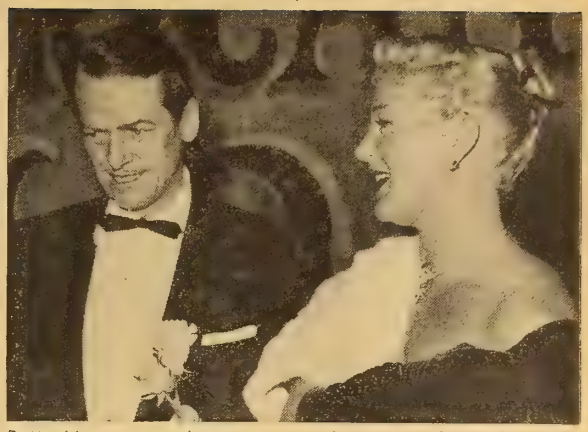
LANA TURNER is a one-man woman . . . one man at a time, I mean. When she is in love, it's no one else but Mr. Man of the Moment for Lana.

It's Fernando Lamas who has captured all her time and attention these days and nights. Daytimes, he makes love to Lana in front of the cameras in The Merry Widow. Evenings, he makes love to Lana—period.



Fernando is the nearest thing to a torrid lover in her life since Turhan Bey. He (Lamas) is a South American who kizzes zee hand, bows from zee waist and acts as though he had never lived before he met Lana.

Whether he LIVED or not, Lamas was most definitely married to a South American beauty who followed him to this country and then took a quick trip home when she found out the way the wind was blowing.



Apparently, she did not want to hold on to Fernando very much (they had separated several times) and she is not in the least in love with her husband. But before bidding adieu to Hollywood AND Fernando, she arranged for the alimony that would bring her and their little daughter back to this country.

Lana has some alimony problems of her own. She has not been able to file for divorce from Bob Topping because they cannot reach an agreement on money matters.

Whether Lamas gets more than a "separate maintenance" parting from his wife remains to be seen. Divorce is rare in South America

Leslie Caron, the Gallic dancing sensation who co-starred with Gene, slipped in to American In Paris premiere unnoticed, was mobbed by fans when she came out. With her was her American husband, George Hormel, the meat packing heir.

Betty Hutton was the most vivacious star in the audience at the American premiere. Reason was dance director, Charles O'Curran. "He's the greatest in the world!" Betty says.

Lana Turner's premiere date was Fernando Lamas, her co-star in MGM's The Merry Widow. He's her constant companion on and off the set but is shy about calling it love. So's Lana.

AWAY . . . WILL LIZ TAYLOR BE MRS. MICHAEL WILDING COME THE DAWN OF 1952? . . . SHELLEY AND FARL ARE FINI.

because of strict religious beliefs.

A LEGEND to last long after the Angel Gabriel blows his trumpet is the story of Clifton Webb's devotion to his mother, Maybelle. Mrs. Webb has been in very bad health and she was in St. John's Hospital for weeks.

While she was away, Clifton redecorated Maybelle's room in the palest yellow and it is so beautiful that it could be used to illustrate a page at least in one of the better home magazines.

Clifton invited some of us . . . about 80 . . . for a "preview" of the room with dinner following prepared as only the fastidious Mr. Webb does things. The food, I must say, was the best (and richest!) I've eaten since I started to be conscious of my figure.

It was a wonderful party with Lauren Bacall and Humphrey Bogart (close pals of Clifton's); Linda and Ty Power . . . Linda chatters incessantly about that new baby . . . and many other well known players and friends of Clifton's attending.

OVERHEARD in the fitting room of Don Loper's swank salon:

Fitter to Ava Gardner Sinatra: "Madame, you have the most gorgeous figure I have ever seen."

Ava Gardner Sinatra to fitter: "It won't be for long! We want a baby right away!"

Ava tells an amusing story about their honeymoon in Havana. Some Cuban friends took over a cafe and a small band playing there to welcome her and Frank to Havana.

The rhumba-happy musicians had been asked to play "Here Comes The Bride" when Ava and Frankie entered. They DID—as it's never been played before! Not knowing "Here Comes The Bride" beyond the opening stanza, they swung into "Happy Birthday To You" and wound up on "Stars and Stripes Forever."

What's that old copybook maxim about "familiarity breeds contempt"?

Maybe that's pretty strong to say in writing about Shelley Winters and Farley Granger but Shell and Farl are as cold as a dead mackerel. They saw all the shows in New York together, they went to Europe together and came back together. And then the deep freeze set in.

SHELLEY, who is always copy for the newsboys, came out with a story that she had found the "real love" of her life—a Vittorio Gassman, Italian actor, whom she described as the Laurence Olivier of Italy, "only better looking and a better actor"!

He responded by inviting Shell to come to Italy and play in his picture.

However, this great "new love" is not keeping Shelley from alternating nightly dates with handsome Vince Edwards (he looks like Burt Lancaster's double) and Sidney Chaplin, actor son of Charlie Chaplin.

No one knows how much Shelley cares about any of these gents but she certainly

Before you cross a crowded room—of strangers—better get your bearings. Instead of anteloping in (only to flounder midway, flustered), pause at the door long enough to spy your hostess. Then beeline (but s-l-o-w-l-y) in her direction; she'll take over from there. Even if it's "that" time, don't dismay. You'll be comfortable, confident with Kotex. Your uppers-and-lowers lack that alabaster look? Along with faithful brushwork, pucker-paint helps. To make teeth seem whiter, blue-red's the lipstick hue for you. And on sanitary protection days, learn what a difference it makes, poise-wise, to choose a "just-for-you" absorbency of Kotex. (3 different sizes, for different days.)

gives us columnists something to write about—that none of us can deny.

THE story sent out by one Private First Class Charles Slotik that our GI's are tired of such tried and true favorites as Lana Turner, Betty Grable, Rita Hayworth, Hedy Lamarr, Esther Williams and others, serves to remind us that we are all of us growing older, darling.

PFC's cutting comment was, "The fellows don't admire the same girls their uncles did in the last war. They're too old for us."

I just can't believe the merciless, frank Private Slotik is speaking for all the boys. I know the terrific numbers of requests for photos of Lana, Betty, Rita, Hedy, Esther that flood their studios. And they are mainly from service men.

I was thinking, "Who among the young favorites do they want if the leading glamor girls belong to the last war and to the daddys and uncles"?—as Slotik said.

Ann Blyth is enormously popular. Then, there's Debbie Reynolds, that tingling little teenager; Debra Paget, with her spiritual appeal; the hey hey Mitzi Gaynor girl; Doris Day, who looks like Miss America, herself; Janet Leigh, in spite of those low-cut gowns—yes, I guess these are the gals the younger boys like for Pin-Ups.

But don't forget—there are still a lot of daddys and uncles alive in the world today, kids!

JIMMY Stewart, sitting with his Gloria and Gary Cooper and Pat Neal at Cobina Wright's buffet dinner, suddenly grabbed for his napkin and held it to the corner of his mouth. Blood was trickling down his chin.

"Bit my tongue," Jimmy said in explanation through clenched teeth.

"Hold some cold water in your mouth," said Gary. "It will stop the bleeding."

It usually does—but not in Jimmy's case. His tongue kept bleeding and bleeding and soon he and Gloria flew out the door in search of a doctor. In my books, this goes down in

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Popular Joan Evans keeps the columnists guessing. Now they're wondering about Chris Randall who took her to Detective Story premiere.

Debbie Reynolds, MGM's star of Singin' In The Rain, happily shares an umbrella with good looking Craig Hill, her premiere escort.

Mr. and Mrs. John Wayne were among the 200 honored guests at a dinner given for the stars who participated in "Movietime, U.S.A."

the records as the most freakish accident ever to happen at a social affair.

Cobina's party was in honor of Helena Rubinstein, the famed cosmetician, and Madame Rubinstein paid the beautiful femme guests a highly personal compliment by saying they all looked like they used her beauty preparations!

Joan Fontaine (is she putting on a little weight?) seemed to be having an extra good time. I don't know who the gent was who kept pursuing her, but he apparently couldn't let Joan out of his sight—or his arms—because he waltzed her cheek-to-cheek right up to the buffet table while everyone else was standing in line.

Betty Hutton, in a white dress with a sassy bustle, was showing off her new beau, Charles O'Curran, and telling everyone within earshot that he was the "best dance director in the world". (This must be love. After Betty went to Honolulu on a vacation, O'Curran flew over just for the privilege of spending Saturday and Sunday in her company.)

PERSONAL Opinions: I like short hair but—I'm not sure I like it on Janet Leigh (yes, she's succumbed and is sporting a very short coiffure) . . . Coming up fast in the sweepstakes of Best Dressed Women—Ava Gardner. She delighted the hearts of stylists by wearing hats, gloves and veils with her daytime clothes in New York . . . American In Paris is running strong in the pre-Academy balloting for the "best picture" sweepstakes . . . Debbie Reynolds is still the cutest thing in town. She told the MGM press boys she'd like some "romance" publicity. Only trouble is—she ain't got no romance! . . . I can't take Betty Hutton's maaad passion for dance director, Charlie O'Curran, too seriously. When ever ISN'T la Hutton maaadly in love with someone? . . . What a wonderful father Alan Ladd is. He never bothers with his own publicity, but he cut out the clippings and proudly showed everybody the picture of his Carol Lee Ladd as one of the pretty Princesses selected in the UCLA homecoming festivities. "Next year, when she's a senior, she'll be QUEEN," predicts the proud stepfather . . . Esther Williams always seems so preoccupied and not interested in a conversation unless it is about her career, her business interprises or her family . . . The bitterest man I know is Clark Gable. Even his best friends don't mention the name "Sylvia" in the King's presence.

APPARENTLY, Marie Wilson doesn't think pink is unlucky. She wore a pink hat, dress, shoes and bag when she married Allan Nixon eight years ago.

When she married TV actor-producer, Bob Fallon, a few weeks ago, Marie was again an "all pink" bride, big pink lace hat, pink lace gown and she carried pink roses.

Everybody likes Marie—including her ex-husband, and wishes her well in her new marriage. Supposed to be the "dumb blonde" of the Irma series on radio, screen and TV—she's really about as dumb as a fox. She knows that her faux pas are her stock in trade and have made her what she is today—faux pas PLUS, of course.

Not many people know that Marie is a very well-fixed lady financially. She gets top money in three entertainment mediums and she invests it cagily. Personally, she does not go in for expensive clothes and furs and jewels and she doesn't throw lavish parties.

When the time comes for Marie to bow out of the spotlight—as it comes to even the most beautiful of movie stars—she'll be "beholden" to no one.

THOSE two zany madmen, Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis, work together with the affection of brothers—but several people have commented to me on the fact that after working hours they seem to go their separate ways. "Don't they like each other?" they'll ask, disappointedly.

Of course they do! They are devoted. But here is the way that Jerry explains the system they have successfully worked out for their private lives.

"Dean and his wife have their circle of friends—and so do Patty and I. We frequently enter a cafe or a nightclub and spot the Martins in a booth across the room with their pals. But here is the gimmick:

"Dean and I have talked it out and we both realize that nothing under the sun must come between us as partners. We both have wonderful wives. But, you know how gals are—one gets a longer mink than the other, or an extra diamond in an earring and—heaven love 'em, well—you know how they are. And what can happen.

"So, while we are all very friendly—we don't attempt to turn the team of Martin and Lewis into a constant foursome. It's better that way." Smart boys.

THE Letter Box:

Pat R is fed up with Janet Leigh's endless interviews on Tony Curtis, "I Love Him," "We Belong Together," etc. "Even the most stupid of us assume they, naturally, love one another or they would not have married. But golly, do they have to keep shouting it from all the treetops?"

"T" Gentles, of Jamaica, is indignant about the interview Linda Darnell gave out panning the climate and living conditions of Jamaica. "Miss Darnell talks out of both sides of her mouth. When she arrived here to make Saturday Island she told reporters she loved the place."

To Dolores: It's usually well established singers who are invited to be the voice behind the silent lip-movements of non-singing screen stars.

Hey, Steve Cochran, there are lots of mentions of you in this month's mail. Tony Dexter, however, is still top man.

That's all for now. See you next month.

Intimate Feminine Hygiene

Greaseless Suppository Assures Hours of Continuous Action — Daintier . . . More Convenient

Each in separate glass vial

Zonitors are greaseless, stainless snow-white vaginal suppositories which offer women a far daintier, more convenient method for feminine hygiene. And every woman today fully realizes the necessity of feminine cleanliness for married happiness, her health, after her periods and to guard against an odor more offensive than bad breath or body odor.

So POWERFUL yet SAFE to Tissues

Zonitors provide a powerfully effective yet harmless higher type of hygiene. When inserted, Zonitors release the same powerful type of germ-killing and deodorizing properties as world-famous ZONITE. And they continue to do so for hours. Positively non-poisonous, non-irritating. Ready for immediate use. No mixture or apparatus required!

Easy to Carry if Away From Home

Zonitors actually eliminate odor. They help guard against infection and kill every germ they touch. While it's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, you can DEPEND on Zonitors to immediately kill every reachable germ. So easy to carry if away from home. So easy to use at home!

A new gossip column by Mike Connolly famous columnist for the Hollywood Reporter

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT: Oscar time is rolling around once again, and Hollywood is talking about the following as top contenders for Academy Awards—Marlon Brando, Vivien Leigh and Kim Hunter for their wonderful acting in A Streetcar Named Desire; Monty Clift, Shelley Winters and Liz Taylor for A Place In The Sun; Jane Wyman, The Blue Veil; Fredric March, Death Of A Salesman; Arthur Kennedy, Bright Victory; Ethel Barrymore and Maurice Evans, Kind Lady; Peter Ustinov and Leo Genn, Quo Vadis; Dorothy McGuire, I Want You; Irene Dunne, The Mudlark; Mel Ferrer, The Brave Bulls; Gregory Peck, David And Bathsheba; Ava Gardner, Show Boat; Thelma Ritter, The Mating Season; Eleanor Parker and Lee Grant, Detective Story; James Cagney and Gig Young, Come Fill The Cup and Alexander Knox, Saturday's Hero. Who's your favorite?

Baby-sitting a serious subject? Yup—and 20th plans making a picture about it with Dick Widmark and Marilyn Monroe. Plot revolves around a baby-sitter who protects her infant charge against a demented relative. . . . John Agar attended Alcoholics Anonymous meetings during his prison stretch at the Wayside Honor Farm. Now that he's out, he and Loretta are planning on raising a family—and John's golf score is in the low 70's. . . . John was a model prisoner and so was Dick Contino, serving time at NcNeil Island penitentiary on the draft evasion charge. Dick played the accordion every Sunday at Mass, and then for Protestant services. It's my hunch that these basically decent lads will find themselves. . . . Hal LeSeuer, Joan Crawford's brother, joined AA too. . . . So did Larry Tierney. And his brother, Scott Brady, supervised his removal from Neurological Hospital to Scott's own home. Larry footed the bills when Scott was trying to get a foothold in Hollywood; now it's Scott's turn. Warners picked up its option on Steve Cochran, fastest climber on the studio's fan mail list, for another year. He's in the $2,000-a-week bracket now. And quite a boy with the gals. Sudden thought: Why doesn't somebody do a picture of his romantic private life?

GILDING THE LILY: Bob Stack came back from England with nothing but raves for the British belles. Even went so far as to say they're chic! . . . Charles Le Maire, 20th's dress designer, tells me, "I saw an eight-year-old Claudette Colbert picture in a screening room the other night. Her gowns weren't dated. She and the designer had agreed on clothes that were able to withstand the test of twice four years" . . . They've been calling Jean Simmons' husband Gams Granger. Stewart gads around the MGM lot, veddy British, in shorts.

Jean Peters' favorite birthday gift from an admirer was an enormous emerald ring smothered in baguettes. . . . Denise Darcel went to Hedda Hopper's party for stylist Ceil Chapman with gold-dust sprinkled in her topknot. Richard Greene sidled up to her and whispered, "Kin I go prospecting in your hair?" . . . Anybody besides us notice the muscular build of Denise, who's now known around town as Goddess of the Bodice? Makes her look like a lady wrestler! . . . Gal we know (Continued on page 14)

"I nearly froze in sunny California!"

"Skiing is my hobby, but wind and frost on the slopes can bite your skin raw, even while folks, a few miles away, bask in California sunshine. So Jergens Lotion is always in my suitcase. Here's what happened on my last trip:

"My first day out, my hands and face got stinging red and chapped. But later, Jergens softened my reddened, rough skin beautifully. Jergens is never a bit sticky, either . . .

"Before skating, I protected my hands and face with Jergens Lotion. You can prove Jergens contains quickly-absorbed ingredients, instead of oils that merely coat skin . . .

"Just try this 'film' test: See how water won't bead on a hand smoothed with Jergens as on a hand coated with an oily skin care . . .

"At the studio, my skin was soft, smooth—ready for close-ups." (That's why Hollywood stars prefer Jergens 7 to 1 over other hand cares.)

Use Jergens Lotion this winter, for soft and pretty skin. Used by more women than any other hand care in the world. 10¢ to $1.00, plus tax.

flounced into a dress shop, asked for a checkered vest, and handed the salesgirl a photo of Tony Curtis wearing the one she wanted.

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH: The big battle, of course, was Franchot Tone's with newshen Florabel Muir in Ciro's . . . But the King Brothers claim that the publicity accruing to Barbara Payton spells an added $1,000,000 in their bank accounts for Drums In The Deep South, in which they gave Barbara a starring role and for which they paid her $1,650 a week to make personal appearances with it . . . No starlet since Betty Grable has had the publicity build-up Mitzi Gaynor's getting at 20th . . . Everybody threw their hands up in despair on hopes for a Diana Lynn-John Lindsay reconciliation when John put their home up for sale and scrammed East.

As you know, Claudette Colbert became ill and had to bow out, after several weeks of shooting, as Bob Mitchum's co-star in Howard Hughes's The Korean Story. Joan Crawford and Jane Greer were among those mentioned to succeed Claudette but Ann Blyth won the assignment. However, Ann fought for—and won!—approval rights on all ad stills. Ann refuses ever to pose for the kind of SEXploitation photos used to advertise Shelley Winters' charms in Behave Yourself! and Jane Russell's in His Kind Of Woman.

FOUR-LEGGED FRIENDS: Hard to imagine Alan Ladd crying, isn't it? Well, I saw him turn on the tears, and in spades! Sue had called me over to their Bel Air place one morning last month. "Do you like boxers?" she asked. "Do I?" I yipped. "I only happen to own King of Marlay, who's the most beautiful male boxer in Hollywood—and from Vic Mature's champion stock!" "Fine," said Sue. "He'll be a good mate for Scarlet O'Hara."

Sue explained that she and Alan had been spending less and less time at the ranch and therefore had to dispose of several of their dogs, including Scarlett—but only to characters like myself who have big yards for the dogs to play in. I rolled around the Ladd lawn with Scarlett, a beautiful fawn, and when Alan decided we were getting along he picked her up in his arms and carried her out to my car. "All I want is one of the pups," he said.

"It's a deal, Alan," I promised.

He kissed her goodbye, smack on the lips—and cried like a baby when we drove off!

As for Scarlett, she and King are expecting a visit from Sir Stork.

FINANCIAL PAGE: Robert Walker left everything he had to his two sons, but "everything" isn't much. His estate was originally estimated at $200,000; actually, it will amount to a mere $25,000 or so after taxes and bills are paid. His house, on which there was a heavy mortgage, was small—only a living room with dining alcove, two bedrooms, maid's room, kitchen and two baths—so there wasn't much furniture. Out of it all, Jennifer Jones, now officially the boys' guardian, picked only Bob's books, records, silver, television set, piano, rocking chair and grandfather's clock. She has put it all in storage for the boys . . . In his last picture, My Son, John, with great-lady-of-the-theater Helen Hayes, Bob gave his finest performance as a young Commie who swears on a stack of Bibles that he's not a Red—the catch being that he doesn't believe in the Bible!

Dottie Lamour (you'll love her, not to mention Betty Hutton, Jimmy Stewart, Cornel Wilde, Gloria Grahame and Charlton Heston in C. B. DeMille's Greatest Show On Earth) accepted her first night-club engagement in many years, singing at the Last Frontier in Las Vegas for two weeks for $10,000 a week . . . C. B., by the way, took Wilde aside after he finished flexing his bulging muscles for Greatest Show and told our boy it's his best acting job since A Song To Remember—but to be careful about picking his future parts so that he won't take a nosedive from his present popularity peak . . . The Huttontot, bubbling over about her great part in this picture, said, "Lindsay and Candy had never seen me perform my flying act in it. So I brought my two angel-faces over to the set, and when I was through flying through the air I rushed over to them. 'Well! Did you like mother?' I asked breathlessly. 'Yes,' said Lindsay, 'but where are the CLOWNS?'"

QUICK QUOTES: Monty Clift, as seen through the eyes of George Stevens, who directed him in A Place In The Sun: "Monty had a tremendous burden to carry in this picture. His conscientiousness caused him to be regarded as strange in some quarters due to the fact that he preferred to stay home and rehearse for the next day's work rather than go to the various Hollywood glitter spots" . . . I got a bang out of the way the British papers headlined Shelley and Farley Granger during their London visit: "Hollywood's Perpetual Fiancees" . . . Ida Lupino, whose Filmakers Productions gave you Sally Forrest and Keefe Brasselle, among others: "After offering our audiences pictures like Not Wanted, Outrage and On The Loose, respectively, we are seriously thinking of changing the character of our fan mail by producing 'The Bobbsey Twins'!" . . . John Wayne, June Allyson's co-winner of MODERN SCREEN's annual award, gave out with a typically modest Waynism when told he topped the male poll: "Why?"

WHO'S MAD AT WHO: I was prowling for news on a certain lot one afternoon when I heard loud screams coming from the dressing room of one of Hollywood's "great ladies." Her maid, who was waiting outside while the star held a private conference with the studio boss about how another, younger girl in the cast was stealing scenes from her, went running back, accompanied by a studio cop and a fireman. The boss, who doesn't like to see women cry, beat it back to his office, and when the star came out of her tantrum she paid the maid, the cop and the fireman $10 apiece to say nothing about the scene! . . . Ran into Mickey Rooney and Martha Vickers at Ciro's and asked them what was new (that's always a good opening!). "Just talking about the baby," said the Mick. But later we learned Martha was quizzing him about the $2,000-a-month alimony he had been ordered to pay her. And, a week later, he got a co-starring spot with Bob Hope in Military Policemen. Mickey'll get $75,000 for this job, so it looks like Martha will be okay.

FUNNIES: It's Red Skelton's story. Man dashed into a hardware store, pounded on the counter and demanded in a loud voice, "Gimme a mouse trap—I gotta catch a bus!" To which the clerk replied, "Sorry, sir, we don't have one that big!" . . .

We have it on reliable authority from practically unimpeachable sources that when Dagmar met Jane Russell at RKO the two gals didn't get close enough to shake hands! . . . 20th bought a story about a professor who finds a serum that makes a man look 15 years younger. Now the studio can't find a leading man who'll admit he could be that old . . . This marks the 322nd anniversary of the introduction of popcorn to America. That makes it 267 years older than the first movie . . . Ever notice how married names deglamorize the stars—like Greer Fogelson, Claudette Pressman and Viveca Siegel? . . . An Internal Revenue man told me (some of them have a sense of humor!) the Government's thinking of putting Esther Williams' picture on our currency, so we won't mind kissing it goodbye. That's what the man said . . . Dale Robertson, describing another actor: "It's easy to see why he's considered conceited—his 'I's' are so close together!"

TIME TABLES: Did you enjoy seeing the stars in person on the "Movietime U. S. A." tours? Hollywood is setting up more trips, cause they're good for business, not to mention the morale of our actors—television being the threat that it is! . . . John Wayne phoned me from Dallas, raving about his "Movietime" experiences. "We played to better than 750,000 people in 30 stops," he said, "and our reception was just unbelievable. I loved meeting the fans and hope we can all do it again as soon as possible" . . . Jeff Chandler told me he had a ball on his trip, too, although he lost his wedding ring in Waco . . . Keefe Brasselle's medico put him on a milk-shake-and-egg diet to help him regain all that poundage he shed "Movietiming" to Cleveland and other points Midwest.

DANCING DOLLS: I've got a bet on that the French Ballet's gift to Hollywood, piquant Leslie Caron, will soon be one of the town's brightest stars. Leslie, a true Parisienne, told me she dreams in French and Technicolor. Nice dreaming . . . Joan Crawford, after the same preem, said it's so-ooo good she's ready to put on her dancing shoes again . . . I'll stick my neck out right now and say that MGM will give its biggest femme star buildups this year to Leslie, Pier Angeli and Debbie Reynolds.

Fred Astaire asked MGM for Vera-Ellen as his pirouette partner in I Love Louisa, his next picture. That'll be their third whirl around a studio soundstage together . . . Rhonda Fleming was supposed to attend the Royal Command Performance in London but didn't. She was scheduled to dance a number with Van Johnson. Her trip was cancelled because those in charge of arrangements didn't give her enough time to learn the routine to perfection.

HE WENT THATAWAY: His pals have nicknamed Guy Madison "Wild"—because of the new career he has made for himself with Andy Devine on TV and radio as "Wild Bill Hickok" . . . Did you know Guy was born in Pumpkin Center, Calif.? Honest! . . . Gabby Hayes made a personal appearance in Atlanta. A woman fan rushed up to him and gave his whiskers a healthy yank. "Great Scott," she shouted, "they're real!" . . .

Somebody asked Roy Rogers how he likes co-starring with Bob Hope in Son of Paleface. Roy said, "Terrible. All I've ever had to do is look soulful at Trigger. Now they're giving me dialogue!" . . . Apparently the youngsters are tired of 20 cowboy shows a night on TV. How else explain the fact that Bill "Hoppy" Boyd, who started it all, has opened an agency that produces other kinds of video shows than sagebrushers? . . . Another laff-line, from Callaway Went Thataway, starring Howard Keel: "All a cowboy needs in television is two expressions—hat on, hat off!" . . . Here's a Columbia-the-Gem-of-the-Autry coincidence: Gene Autry makes his Westerns for Columbia Pictures, his records for Columbia Records, and his radio and TV stints are for Columbia Broadcasting System.

ON THE FIRING LINE: I've got a motto for all of you. "If you really want to give something from the heart, make it a blood donation for the boys overseas" . . . Everyone's excited about going to Korea, Europe or wherever USO-Camp Shows wants to send them to entertain the boys. Well, almost everyone. Some of the big stars are afraid they won't be appreciated, since they can't sing or dance, but this isn't true—not if I'm to believe what I've been told by guys and gals like Jack Benny, Danny Kaye, Bob Hope, Jennifer Jones, Benay Venuta, Errol Flynn and others on USO's Honor Roll. Rita Hayworth was all for going too, last we heard, and may have made it by the time you read this . . . And all this just as Rita was getting comfortable in her new $600-a-month house and pool just above Sunset Strip. She has an option to buy it. . . . Army Auxiliary Corps took in $8,000 at its Travis Air Base auction at Romanoff's, including Virginia Zanuck's $900 bid for an Irene gown. Arthur Loew, Jr., put up $450 for a Howard Greer creation (nobody thought to ask which lucky gal would get to wear it!), and Keenan Wynn got so excited he started auctioning off his mustache, hair by hair. Dinah Shore sang "It's a Most Unusual Day," as indeed it was.

In Phone Call From A Stranger, Bette Davis and Gary Merrill are working on the same 20th set where they met while making All About Eve. Incidentally, Bette's two costume changes for this picture (a swimsuit and a faded nightgown) set the studio back all of $4.89.

HOME FIRES BURNING: Dick Widmark, who once giggled when he pushed an old lady down the stairs and since then has slain hundreds of innocents for 20th, forbids television in his home. He's afraid of the impact of its horror pictures on his child! . . . Just before she married Frankie, Ava Gardner bought a kingsize, six-by-seven-foot bed for her Pacific Palisades palazzo. White floral design for the pure Irish linen bedspread is backgrounded by gray. The flounce, also gray linen, is kick-pleated. And the mattress is 21 inches deep . . . Frankie's long-distance calls to Ava the month before they tied the knot set him back $1,200.

Ty Power brought Linda and Romina home from the hospital to their new Beverly Hills house to find the plumbing switched. The shower poured cold and the youknowhat ran hot! . . . Eleanor Parker tells me, "I want children, lots of them. I want enough to make Maureen O'Sullivan and John Farow look like slackers!" . . . And Tony Curtis leaned over the table in the U-I commissary and confided that he and Janet want a Christmas baby. Next Christmas, that is . . . Bob Hope got his nephew, Art Fagan, a job in Paramount's mail room . . . Jane Powell, who had to quit her personal appearance tour when she passed out in Cleveland because of overwork, certainly recovered in a hurry when she got back to Geary and the baby. I caught her and her spouse having a real whirl at the Mocambo just a few nights after she returned . . . Some of her girl friends have expressed the opinion that the stork would arrive before Jeanne Crain could start her next picture, Gift Of The Magi. You never know in this town!

ODD'S BODKINS: MGM had Liz Taylor "shelved" for over a year. The picture is The Light Fantastic, and Liz made it with Larry Parks before he admitted to the House Un-American Activities Committee that he had once been a Communist. The studio decided not to release the picture right away because of its fear that Larry's testimony would hurt its box-office chances. At press time, it was decided to show it in England before it's premiered in the U. S., to see what the public's reaction will be . . . Glenn Ford, who rushed over to MGM to take over Russell Nype's part in Young Man In A Hurry when Nype was found unsuitable for the role, was given Clark Gable's dressing room there. And Glenn hopes it'll prove lucky . . . Plus which Betsy Von Furstenberg, the new MGM starlet who started dating Nicky Hilton when Liz Taylor left him, used the ex-Mrs. Hilton's dressing room while Liz was making a picture in London . . . Further, Nicky is said to be building a $45,000 tepee in his new home-plus-place-of-business, Midland, Texas . . . Hollywood was really set on its ear, by the way, when word got out that Sylvia Gable would ask $1,000,000 in alimony—several hundred thousand dollars down and the balance at the rate of $100,000 a year! Immediately this was reported, Clark brought in a new battery of lawyers to help him fight her suit . . . Clark's bitterness against Lady Sylvia is so great he's willing to change his entire way of life in order to win his points—including going off salary at MGM and living in another state.

Errol Flynn stole the show at the A Streetcar Named Desire preem here by signing autographs right and left simultaneously. The guy's ambidextrous! . . . A theater owner in Barstow, Calif., did very bad business with Rhubarb, apparently because his customers didn't know what the title meant. So he changed the title of this very funny picture to The Millionaire Tomcat and jammed 'em in . . . Some Los Angeles theaters are turning the pressure in their water founts lower and lower. This stimulates the sale of cold drinks to such as you and me . . . I met Tony Dexter for the first time at a party in the Ciroette Room. A shy, retiring guy. Which makes the acting job he did in Valentino even more impressive . . . Name of the night cop on the main gate at MGM is Kenneth Hollywood . . . THE END

"If you've ever refinished furniture, you know how hard it is on hands," says Val Lewis of New Orleans. "I earn my living by acting on TV. I can't appear before the camera with red, rough hands."

"A friend recommended Noxzema," she continues. "Now it's my regular hand care. That medicated formula really works. I use Noxzema faithfully every night. It helps keep my hands looking lovely."

Hands that work look lovelier in 24 hours* or your money back!

Are you a homemaker? Do you work in a shop or office? Here's the hand cream just for you!

● If you aren't getting much help from your present hand cream, maybe that's because it's made for lady-of-leisure hands. Hands that work need the two-way care Noxzema gives!

Helps heal—helps beautify! Noxzema is especially made to help sore, chapped, unattractive working hands look lovelier these two important ways:

1. Helps heal tiny cuts and cracks quickly, with its unique medicated formula.

2. Helps hands feel softer—look smoother and whiter—supplies a light film of oil-and-moisture to skin's surface!

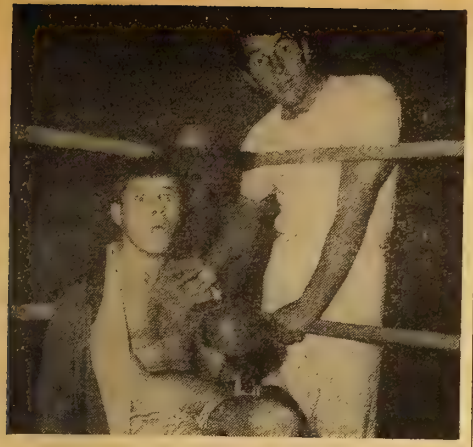
Inspired by a glimpse of a famous star, country-bred Mitzi Gaynor tells her mother of her desire to be an actress.

Handsome stranger Dale Robertson promises to come and see Mitzi perform when her acting dream comes true.



With Dennis Day as her manager, Mitzi travels far, becomes a tremendous success. But her heart belongs to Dale.

Although separated from him because of the Civil War, Mitzi is joyfully reunited with Dale in New York when the war ends.

MOVIE REVIEWS

■ This musical biography of Lotta Crabtree, the Golden Girl of the Civil War era (who won the hearts—and money—of gold miners from Rabbit Creek to San Francisco), is lots of fun, and so full of singing, dancing and good cheer that the silly plot doesn't spoil things too much. Mitzi Gaynor (a new star whose zippy screen personality will take her far) plays Lotta. Delighted when her father loses the family livelihood, a boardinghouse, Mitzi takes to the road as a touring actress, and although her straitlaced mother disapproves, she sings, dances, pulls her skirts higher and higher, and becomes a sensation! She also manages to fall in love with handsome stranger Dale Robertson. Then the plot begins to sag. Dale is revealed as a Confederate spy, but Mitzi, a Northerner, pledges her love for him anyway. Separated because of the war, she continues touring and becomes the most famous actress in the land. She and Dale are finally reunited in a scene that has her singing "Dixie" to a New York audience the day the North wins the war! But Mitzi's song and dance routines, while never as fresh and sparkling as she is herself, more than make up for the corny plot, and the Technicolor is great.
Cast: Mitzi Gaynor, Dale Robertson, James Barton, Una Merkel, Dennis Day, Raymond Walburn, 20th Century-Fox.

SAILOR BEWARE

Jerry Lewis doesn't need a plot; just put a camera on him and he's the funniest character that ever blinked. But Paramount, being generous, wrote a story for him and Dean Martin. The story is, they're in the Navy now, and lucky for the Navy, it's only make-believe. Lewis can't even pass the blood test! All the medics can draw out of his arm is water. In addition to this, he's allergic to women. He just has to sniff one coming and he can't breathe. That wouldn't be bad, except that everytime he's on leave the women surround him. Somehow he becomes known as a lady-killer, and all his buddies bet their pay that Lewis will win a kiss from Corinne Calvet, a singer in Hawaii who's been driving all the boys batty because she's so aloof. But before Lewis gets to Corinne a million things happen. He finds himself trapped on the deck of a submarine about to submerge; he gets involved in an hilarious boxing match with a pro; he does a fantastic hula; he sings with Dean Martin, and he finds one woman (Marion Marshall) he isn't allergic to. If you like Martin and Lewis—and who can help it—you'll roll in the aisles.

DISTANT DRUMS

This movie has some of the best Indian fighting that's been filmed in a long time. It's tense and exciting; the Seminoles' warpaint and costumes are vivid in Technicolor and most of the action takes place in the beautiful but treacherous Florida Everglades. The time is 1840. Captain Quincy Wyatt (Gary Cooper) is a deadly swamp fighter who plans a daring operation to end the seven-year-long war with the Seminoles. His idea is to destroy the fort in enemy territory which is being used as a gun smuggling station. He accomplishes this with a small group of hardy soldiers (which is even smaller when the smoke blows away).

He finds some prisoners in the fort and one of them, Mari Aldon (a new actress who looks like Virginia Mayo) has an electric effect on him. Mari, Cooper and his crew head for safety, but the Indians catch up with them and the fight begins. The Seminoles are stopped by a grass fire Cooper sets, but then Cooper and his men find themselves in the swamps. The only exit is 150 miles on the other side. Soon the swamps are resounding with drum messages from one tribe to another. There are thrilling skirmishes with the Indians, a wonderful view of a Seminole burial ground, an underwater battle to the death between Cooper and the Seminole chief, and a love story that never really gets in the way of the picture.

Cast: Gary Cooper, Mari Aldon, Richard Webb, Ray Teal, Arthur Hunnicutt—Warners.

HONG KONG

The best thing about this movie is Danny Chang, a little Chinese boy who steals the show with his smile. He also brings Ronald Reagan and Rhonda Fleming together. It's this way. Reagan has returned to China after World War II to pick up a few fast bucks. But he chooses a bad time to go back and runs right into the Communist Army. After an air attack, Reagan finds five-year-old Danny floating downstream in a small boat. He slings Danny over his shoulder and after a tramp across open fields he comes to a shelter where Rhonda (who has been working in a mission school) is playing hostess to a whole group of elderly Chinese. Reagan's set to dump Danny in Rhonda's arms and depart, but Rhonda tells him a chartered plane is going to pick them all up and take them to Hong Kong. Reagan sticks. On the plane trip he discovers that Danny has a valuable bejewelled idol hidden in his clothing and that interests him no end. In Hong Kong, Reagan runs into trouble when he tries to sell the idol to a Chinese crook. Somehow, little Danny's charm grows on Reagan, and big Rhonda's charm is beginning to get him, and he's fighting off the feeling that he's a heel. A lot more intrigue follows. Danny is kidnapped, innocent people are stabbed, Reagan becomes remorseful—but in the end, everybody who's still alive has stopped kicking.

Cast: Ronald Reagan, Rhonda Fleming, Danny Chang—Warners.

CALLAWAY WENT THATAWAY

Smoky Callaway (Howard Keel) is a cowboy idol of millions, and all because of television. A series of his ten-year-old films have brought him before the public and made him an American Institution, but Callaway has of alcohol and bad living. Dorothy McGuire and Fred MacMurray are advertising partners responsible for Smoky's new popularity and they can make a million on him—but they can't find him. So they do the next best thing—they find a real cowboy who looks just like him. His name is Stretch Barnes (Keel plays this role, too) and he's a simple, modest, sober fellow. The only reason he agrees to pass himself off as Smoky is because he thinks Smoky is dead and he feels he can do a big service to American kids. Naturally, the old Smoky turns up at the crucial moment reeking of liquor, making passes at every woman he sees and anxious to cash in on the profits. Idealistic Stretch, meanwhile, has unwittingly pulled a fast one. He's promised to convert his salary into a youth fund. Can the real Smoky stop him? Will Stretch continue on as Smoky (because if he doesn't, goodbye McGuire and MacMurray's reputations)? And will Stretch get the girl? (Naturally, he's fallen for McGuire who has an "understanding" with MacMurray.) Go see the movie. It's terrific.

Cast: Howard Keel, Dorothy McGuire, Fred MacMurray, Jesse White—MGM.

RED MOUNTAIN

You can see Alan Ladd in Technicolor, and in one scene he's bare to the waist. Aside from that, this is just another shoot-em-up. The year's 1865, and Arthur Kennedy, a former Confederate soldier, is accused of murder. (You don't need witnesses to hang a Rebel for murder in Canyon City.) All set to be lynched Kennedy's saved in a spectacular move by Ladd. They ride off together to Kennedy's secret hideout and then Kennedy begins to wonder why Ladd, a stranger, saved him. He decides that Ladd's the killer and plans to vindicate himself by taking him back to Canyon City, but Ladd's too quick on the draw and escapes. Enter Liz Scott who finds her boyfriend (that's Kennedy) all tied up and thrown in a corner. She unties Kennedy and they chase Ladd. Find him, too, but once again, Ladd turns the tables and Kennedy gets a broken leg and spirit to match. Comes the morning and General Quantrell rides up with his cavalry. Quantrell (John Ireland) is a notorious southern guerrilla chief and Ladd is waiting to join him. Eventually, Ladd learns that Quantrell isn't fighting for the South, but for himself so he goes over to Liz Scott's side (she hates the Rebels) and the shooting begins. Fortunately for Ladd, the Civil War ends before he can switch his allegiance again, and he explains the reason for his murdering the man in Canyon City to the satisfaction of all. Anyway, Liz Scott is happy.

WEEK END WITH FATHER

Van Heflin, a widower with two little girls, and Patricia Neal, a widow with two little boys, meet at the train station while sending their offspring to summer camp. Of course, the end result isn't hard to figure, but the final clinch is delayed by one hilarious circumstance after another—there's a predatory actress after Van and a Tarzan after Pat. (These two, by the way, are the children's candidates for new mama and papa.)

Van and Pat fall in love and visit their kids together to announce their wedding plans. Van has to prove himself to his new sons, however, and is a total flop at sack racing, canoeing, and other athletic ventures. And, Van's girls can't see calling Pat "Mother." However, the cagey children swallow their dislike, team up and get lost in the woods in order to bring Van and Pat back together again. If you like comedies where people fall face first into layer cakes and stumble blindfolded into lakes, then this is your meat.

Cast: Van Heflin, Patricia Neal, Gigi Perreau, Virginia Field.—Universal-International.

ROOM FOR ONE MORE

This one's aimed for the heart and it gets there. You'll cry (happy tears) and chuckle, and if you're a mother with less than five kids you'll feel unfulfilled. Betsy Drake and Cary Grant are the parents of three bright, sweet children. (One of them—George Winslow—is knee high with a voice pitched lower than his ankles, and you'll want to take him home.) Betsy's the kind of girl who needs things to love—stray dogs, cats, rabbits—anything that's bedraggled and lonesome. Cary's the kind of husband who likes the status quo (he can't afford anything else) and when Betsy starts bringing children home from a local welfare agency he gets a little upset. Betsy's first find is an adolescent girl who's been so mistreated she bites every hand that feeds her, but two weeks in the Grants' happy, well-adjusted home and she's an angel. Next comes a crippled boy who's so mean and ornery even Betsy's discouraged. But she's up on child psychology and has the patience of a saint, and you know what happens to that boy—angel number two. While all this character building is going on, Cary's acting the comical, neglected husband, his children are learning how to make sacrifices nobly and you're learning a lesson which is—children who are bad get that way only because they're not loved. It's true, and even though Room For One More doesn't stop punching when it's ahead, it's warm, ingratiating entertainment.

Cast: Cary Grant, Betsy Drake, Iris Mann, George Winslow, Clifford Tatum, Jr.—Warners.

Radiant Ava and Frank planed into Los Angeles in mid-November after the Philly wedding for which they'd waited two years.

"we finally made it"

They're married now—but is it forever? Friends can't help wondering, and worrying, about Frankie and Ava.

BY MARSHA SAUNDERS

■ After Judge Joseph Sloane said, "I now pronounce you man and wife," Frank took Ava in his arms and kissed her thoroughly.

Then Ava ran across the room to hug Frankie's mother. Sinatra grasped the Judge's hand and sighed, "Well, we finally made it!"

Frankie didn't realize it, but all of Hollywood was echoing his sigh of relief. Ava and Frankie had finally made it.

It had taken two years, thousands of dollars, 40 transcontinental air trips, flights to Mexico, Reno, and Las Vegas, countless hours of heartache and legal bickering. But at long last Ava Lavinia Gardner Rooney Shaw had become the new Mrs. Frank Sinatra.

"I can't tell you how happy I am," Ava told her new mother-in-law at the wedding. Mrs. Sinatra looked at her and then burst into tears. "I'm happy, too," she sobbed. "You're just what Frankie needs." She patted Ava's shoulder affectionately.

Frank, her only son, came over, and she kissed him, too. Then the guests circled Frankie and Ava and toasted them with champagne. Ava cut the wedding cake which was seven tiers high and her sister Beatrice, got the first piece. (Continued on page 85)

the startling loves of Liz Taylor

By the time you read this, she may be married again . . . but who'd want to bet on the little girl who became Hollywood's femme fatale almost overnight?

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

■ Two years ago this writer sat in the Paramount commissary in Hollywood and had a luncheon interview with Elizabeth Taylor. She was 17 years old. She was, as she is now, excitingly beautiful, limpid-eyed and the sexiest-looking creature he had ever seen. She was late for the luncheon because her teacher had insisted she finish a lesson in Civics—and Liz was petulant and very adolescent about it.

The story that came out of the interview was printed in MODERN SCREEN and it painted a picture of her youthfulness and brought out the fact that despite her maddening appearance, she was entirely incapable of coping with the adult world. Her concerns were for her school work, the few dollars a week she was allowed as spending money and her real fear that because of her two broken engagements she might never find a man who would belong to her alone and forgive her for her "racy past." She spoke of these things as a child would—and she meant everything she said.

But that was two years ago. Now she is 19.

When Elizabeth Taylor arrived in New York from London and Paris early this winter she was met at the airport by a studio representative who had been assigned to assist her through customs. The young man was used to this sort of thing and was seldom impressed by the odd traveling habits of movie queens. However, when they began to unload Liz Taylor's luggage, his eyes bugged out in disbelief. At better than a dollar a pound cost in excess weight, what appeared (Continued on page 29)

In the customs office the studio representative stood by her elbow as the manifest and declaration was checked.

"Now about this item here, Miss Taylor," said the customs man, "am I correct in stating that you are declaring $25,000 worth of wardrobe?"

"That's right," said Liz.

"And you bought all of it abroad?" asked the official.

"No," said Liz, "I bought all of it in this country."

"Let me see that thing," said the studio man grabbing the paper. "You don't have to pay duty on any of that."

The customs man agreed and Liz was soon cleared and on her way. Driving to town, with two limousines filled with her belongings trailing behind, the studio employee chided Liz (Continued on page 97)

hollywood's most tragic people

by Louella Parsons

■ I've thought long and carefully before selecting the stars whom I believe to be the most tragic figures of Hollywood.

Many headlines have been wrongly blamed on Hollywood. For instance, I do not consider that Lawrence Tierney or Barbara Payton are responsibilities of Hollywood. Poor Tierney, an emotionally ill boy, would be his own worst enemy in any walk of life, anywhere. And the blonde Payton woman would be a trouble-making femme fatale even in a pickle factory.

Who, then, are these most tragic figures —the beautiful but damned idols whose pedestals rocked dangerously even while they were at the top of their glory, and then crashed into illness, oblivion or death?

Judy Garland is one of the tragedies of Hollywood. Most assuredly, little Judy with the big, blazing talent is one. By mentioning her first I don't mean that she is the most tragic of all. But she is the greatest waste of golden talent.

What irony that Judy, who could be the greatest musical star on the screen today is in exile from Hollywood!

As I write this Judy has just recovered from a nervous collapse on the stage of the Palace Theater in New York where she brought back vaudeville with a bang, and in so doing became the toast of Broadway.

But even in the glory of her "comeback," Judy again fell victim to the same shattered nerves that wrecked her Hollywood career.

Time after time people ask me, "What's the matter with Judy?" They say, "She isn't called on to work any harder than Betty Hutton or Betty Grable or other musical stars who have been able to stay on their feet. Why is it that she, perhaps the most inspired of all girl singers, can't take it?"

To fully answer that (Continued on page 95)

SHATTERED NERVES wrecked Judy Garland's screen career. Plagued by overweight, emotional insecurity, and two marriage failures, Judy tried to commit suicide last year. Now she's trying to make a big comeback via Broadway.

NEGLECTED HEALTH brought Rudolph Valentin to an early death. Consumed by his career, he had no time for himself or his marriage. While making personal appearances in New York, he took ill and suddenly died.

A BROKEN LIFE was the fate that befell lovable little Mabel Normand, the madcap star of Mack Sennett comedies. A leading figure in the William Desmond Taylor murder case, Mabel's career ended when she became a drug-addict.

Hollywood's glittering lights hide many a shattered heart, a snuffed-out career. Here an outstanding reporter reveals the most pathetic cases of them all.

HOLLYWOOD NIGHT LIFE helped Jean Harlow forget the unhappiness she'd suffered in her three marriages—but it also helped shorten her life. Struck down suddenly by uremic poisoning, Jean was too exhausted to put up a fight. She died at 26.

DRUG ADDICTION led to Wallace Reid's tragic death almost 30 years ago. Wally started using drugs to "pep himself up" so that he could meet the demands of his great popularity. But he soon found himself slave to the habit, died at 32.

THE WRONG WOMAN ruined Franchot Tone's reputation. Barbara Payton not only dragged his name through the mud—she also involved him in a front-page fight. The result: a battered face that may end his movie career.

TALKING PICTURES spelled ruin to the brilliant career of John Gilbert. Heartlessly frank reviews told the world about his "thin, high-pitched, effeminate" voice, and the great lover of the silent screen was soon all washed up in the movies.

SUICIDE was Carole Landis' solution to the problems Hollywood thrust upon her. She sought stability and an emotional anchor in stardom—but found only heartache, an unhappy marriage, and fleeting fame.

EMOTIONALLY UNSTABLE, Robert Walker could possibly have found happiness but not in Hollywood. Its brutal competitiveness burdened him with an inferiority complex, and ruined his relationship with wife Jennifer Jones.

ABANDONED BY HER LOVER when she was about to bear his child, Lupe Velez, the fiery Mexican actress, chose suicide as a way out. She took an overdose of sleeping pills, and ended a life filled with tempestuous—but unsatisfactory—love affairs.

the story ALAN LADD never told

BY JIM HENAGHAN

■ Alan Ladd was born in Hot Springs, Arkansas. His birth was inauspicious, but a few days after his father (also named Alan Ladd) registered said birth at the Hot Springs Court House, the building caught fire and burned to the ground.

While Alan was still an infant, his parents moved to Oklahoma City, where Ladd, Sr., went to work for the state as an accountant.

The Ladds lived in a small flat above a block of stores, and for a young boy it was no ideal residence. In order to be kept off the streets, Alan had to play in the building, a sorry situation for him, but a sadder one for the landlord. For one day Alan, amusing himself with a box of matches, set fire to the building, which promptly converted itself into a heap of ashes like the Hot Springs Court House.

Although he doesn't remember the date, Alan knows that while he was a very small boy his dad died of a heart attack, leaving his wife and son to fend for themselves.

After an uncomfortable period of widowhood, Alan's mother met a young house painter by the name of Jim Beaver—and, after a proper period of courtship, she married him and the family of three moved to Denver, Colorado.

Jim Beaver was an ambitious man. When he realized he would never get rich painting homes in Denver, he decided to go west. On a spring morning in 1920, he packed Alan, his wife and his painting equipment into a 1914 Model T Ford and set out for California.

Today the journey from Denver to Los Angeles is a matter of hours by plane. Even in 1920, it was still just a matter of a few days, but it took Jim Beaver and his family a terrifying six months.

The major problem was money. Beaver had planned to work his way across the country, painting houses and barns, but he had little luck finding customers. He was soon obliged to sell some of his equipment—and the ladders, brushes and pots began to go until he had hardly enough left to practice his trade. (Continued on page 78)

HOW THIS STORY WAS WRITTEN

■ A few weeks ago, Jim Henaghan, noted reporter and magazine writer, spent an evening with his date and the Alan Ladds in Hollywood. They dined at La Rue's, and drove back to Alan's house for a last cup of coffee. Alan seemed a little tired and stretched out in a big chair. Jim motioned to his date that they'd better leave, but as they got up to go Alan said, "Sit down for another minute." "Sure," said Jim, "I'll sit down if you'll tell me something about yourself that you've never told anyone before—give me an exclusive story." This seemed an impossible challenge. Every writer in Hollywood is convinced there's nothing new to say about Ladd. But Alan smiled. "Got your pencil?" he asked, and before Jim recovered Alan began to talk, easily and fast. Fortunately, Jim's date knew shorthand and in a moment she was racing to keep up with Alan. His was an incredible, fascinating tale of a life that had touched the heights of glory and the nadir of despair, and as Alan told it he seemed to be reliving all the wonderful, crazy, sad and happy years. For the first time he was telling it all. And here it is—the kind of yarn a writer only dreams of getting, but that Jim Henaghan snared one lucky night.

Every other actress in Hollywood looks at herself in the mirror and beams—but Doris Day sticks out her tongue!

BY SUSAN TRENT

■ Doris Day, surrounded by her hair dresser, her studio press agent, and her makeup expert, looked at herself in her dressing room mirror. The girl who thinks she is not beautiful, not even pretty, studied her reflection long and carefully. "I don't like my type today," she finally said.

She addressed the mirror once more. "I don't like my type, see?" And then she turned to her friends. "But what?" she asked, "is my type?"

It was a purely rhetorical question, for Doris Day is not a "type." She is much too complicated to fall into any category, and to know her well you must understand all the facets of this many-faceted girl. Analyzing her career and past activities isn't revealing enough. Sure, it adds up and sheds light on the subject, but in the case of a day-to-day girl like Doris it is the present which is important, and it is an examination of her present attitudes which will give you the key to her as a person.

Husband Marty's her business manager, often visits Doris on the set. When he leaves for work, she gives him a going-over, to make sure his clothes are spotless.

The Melchers live simply, spend most evenings at home. On weekends, they throw parties that feature swimming, volleyball and food—but never hard liquor.

Doris wasn't always as comfortably housed as this. When she first came to Hollywood, she lived in a trailer. Even then, she knew how to make the best of it.

what's wrong with the Grangers?

by sheilah graham

THESE PICTURES SHOW JEAN AND STEWART GRANGER

As newlyweds, the laughing, loving Grangers were a stunning example of marital bliss. Soon Stewart began to teach her how to dress, swim, and entertain. Madly in love with him, Jean was a willing pupil.

Why is this famous love match headed for the rocks? Here's a frank analysis and warning...

■ I firmly believe that Stewart Granger loves his wife Jean Simmons. If I didn't, I'd mind my own business—which is to report the facts after they happen. But because this marriage will surely founder unless someone points out the rocks, I hope that Mr. and Mrs. Granger will forgive me if I step in where their other friends apparently fear to tread.

There are six obstacles blocking the road to happiness for the 39-year-old handsome Britisher, and the girl he calls his "child bride." They are money problems, a house that is too big, too many droppers-in, his bossiness, her long wait for work. And his "Anything she can do, I can do better" attitude. Unless some of these problems can be eliminated, I doubt whether Mr. and Mrs. Granger will be at home to each other for many wedding anniversaries.

Because Stewart's bossiness is the biggest hurdle to jump, I'd like to discuss that first. I know he doesn't mean to "sit" on his sweet young wife so continuously and so unmercifully. But the simplest remark from Jean is sure to be contradicted by Jimmy—as Jean and all their intimates call him. His real name, as you know, is Jimmy Stewart, which he had to change because of the longer established Mr. Stewart.

Okay, so we are now in the Granger home. "Isn't it a lovely day?" Jean will remark. Without so much as looking up from his book, Jimmy will say, "You're wrong—it's a terrible day." Another time: Jean, "I thought so and so (mentioning one of their friends) didn't look very well." "I thought he looked fine," automatically from Mr. Granger. Or if Jean says, "He looked fine," Stewart says, "I thought he looked ill." A dress, a book, a play, a movie—you name it—whatever side Jean prefers, her husband prefers the other.

The question is, how long will a girl of Jean's spirited nature tolerate this habitual disagreement? Psychologically, she is rebelling already. There is a song in Guys And Dolls about a girl who always gets a cold when she's romantically unhappy. From the first day of her arrival in Hollywood last Christmas, when I bumped into the honeymooners at Schwab's drug store until last week, when Jean was bedded with a virus, the pretty brunette British actress had suffered through a succession of colds in the head.

"In England," Jean told me recently, "I used to get colds, I expected to. They ran their course and went. Here, when I get a cold it stays on and on and I croak like a frog when it settles in my chest." I'm not a psychiatrist, but a consciously happy woman doesn't have time for non-stop sniffles or croaking—at least not in sunny California!

Now for the Big House problem which is tied in with Money—or rather the absence of it. And this is strange, when you consider that Jean is paid what amounts to $100,000 a picture and Stewart's contract at Metro calls for $4,000 a week. This is a fortune in any language, but Jean, unfortunately, is still being paid in English pounds —36,000 of them—because of her contract with Rank and Pascal. The pounds are all frozen in London. Stewart is a generous type, but (Continued on page 77) me flew and so did the honeymoon. This picture caught the end of their relationship—Jean trying desperately to live to his ideals and Stewart fixing her with his ever-critical eye.

Today, the once-ecstatic Grangers show the strain of a year of misunderstandings and tense situations. Divorce rumors are rife, but a solution is possible because they're still very much in love with each other.

HOW DO THE MOVIE STARS LIVE? ASK JANE POWELL'S NEIGHBOR WHO GETS A DAILY EYEFUL.

love those neighbors

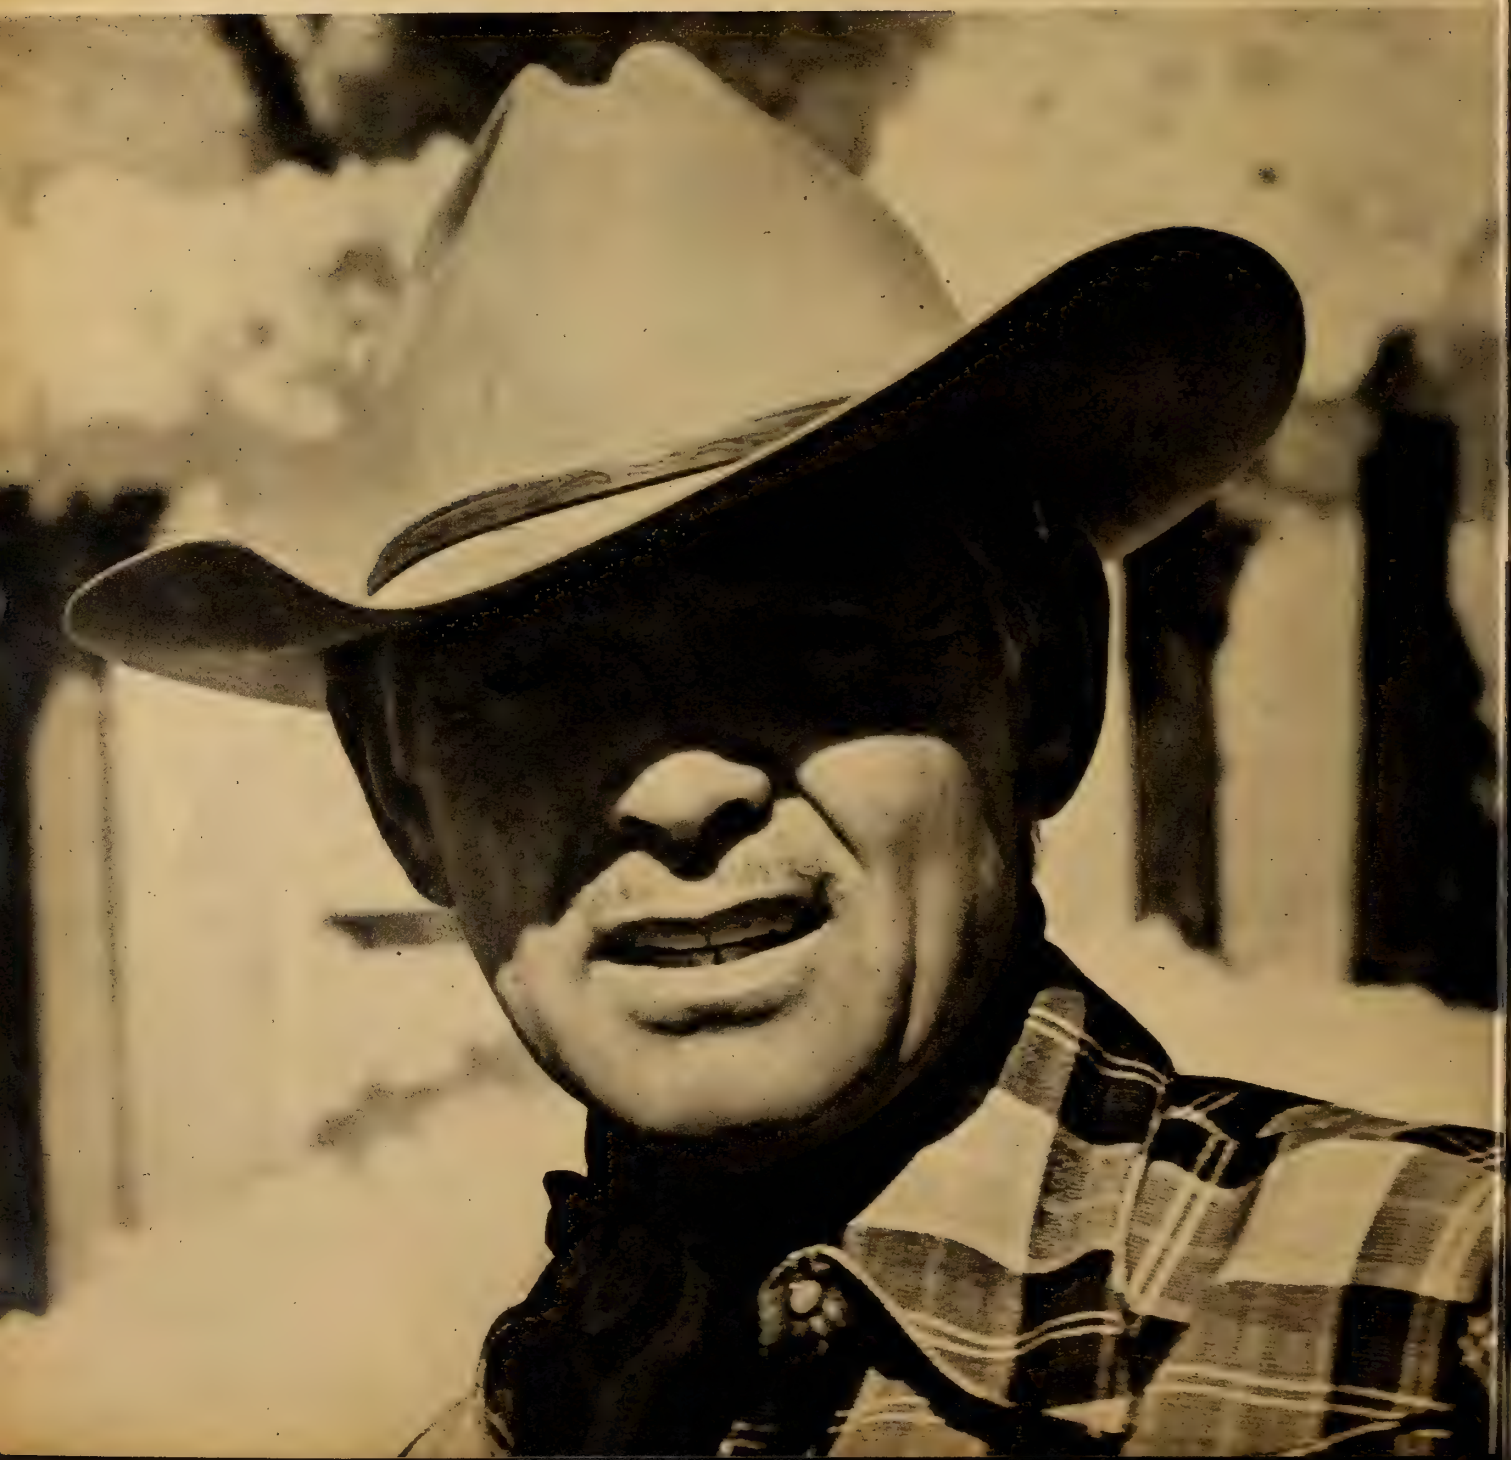
The Steffans are friendly homebodies. Geary III never cries at night (at least, no one hears him); their parties are always quiet and every once in a while Jane charms the neighbors with song.

■ Looking at our street you wouldn't think a movie star lived on it. The houses are fair-to-middling in size, and there isn't a chauffeur in sight. The neighborhood is quiet, and in some places the old trees lock their branches overhead, filtering the sunshine that flows into the many colorful gardens.

When the combined neighborhood learned that Jane Powell and her husband had bought the old Jacobs place, they were a little apprehensive. Reputedly, Jane Powell was a nice young girl, but then that was the trouble—she was young—and she and Geary were likely to throw parties that would wake the dead and knock out the living.

Well, the Steffans have been living a year now in the big white house with green shutters, and the worst noise ever to come from their direction has been the sound of their dog. Paper is some sort of a shepherd dog, and adored by Jane and Geary. It was quiet as a cemetery one night last spring, when suddenly a grinding screech of brakes and a blood-curdling howl rent the air. Immediately, everybody was outside on their front lawns looking for their dogs. But the dog who'd been hit was Paper. Somebody ran over to the Steffan house, but no one was home. Somebody else said Jane and Geary were out for dinner, and it was the maid's night off. So one of the men phoned Jane's father, way over in the valley. Mr. Burce made it to Brentwood in record time and there were tears in his eyes as he lifted Paper into his car. It turned out the dog was all right, except for a paralysis in his tail assembly, and now he walks around with that poor old tail dragging along the ground. Janie told me the vet wanted to amputate it, but she and Geary wouldn't hear of it.

"It's Paper's tail, and it's got to stay," she said. "Even if he does mop up the streets with it."



Anyway, as soon as the Jacobs family moved out, it seemed that Janie and Geary were at the house every day, looking it over and planning changes. The day after the first story appeared concerning the location of the (Continued on page 76)

"LUCKY IN CARDS, UNLUCKY IN LOVE" THEY SAY. IF IT'S TRUE, CLARK MUST BE A WHIZ AT BRIDGE!

Is Gable's love life jinxed?

by Jack Wade

■ Every time Clark Gable gets himself a divorce his fans say, "How come he married that woman in the first place?"

They asked this in 1930 when Gable divorced his first wife, Josephine Dillon, a stage director 17 years his senior.

In 1939 the same inquiry was made concerning Clark's second wife, Maria Langham, a wealthy Texas society matron, 11 years his senior.

Nowadays, in almost imploring tones, everyone is demanding to know "why Gable married Sylvia Ashley, anyway." It's as if everyone in the world but Gable knew for sure that his fourth marriage was destined to fail.

A simple truth about William Clark Gable is that he is a notoriously bad judge of women, and he sought a mother substitute rather than a wife in each of the women he married.

Gable fans may scream in protest at the latter statement—after all, for 20 years he has been built up as the rugged, handsome, self-sufficient he-man—but just examine the facts, study them honestly, and you will arrive at the same conclusion: Gable, with only one exception, has always married mature women who could mother him.

His own mother died when he was seven months old. His only memories of her are "a few (Continued on page 64)

Clark's hard search for love led him into three unsuitable marriages. Only Carole was the perfect mate for him.

First wife: Josephine Dillon, Clark's dramatic coach, married him when she was 40, he was 23.

Second wife: Maria Langham became his bride in 1935. She was 11 years his senior, and about to become a grandmother.

Third wife: Carole Lombard was the one and only for Gable, and would still be, if not for a fatal accident.

Fourth wife: Lady Sylvia Ashley was Mrs. G. for one year, five months, six days.

Will Virginia Grey, the girl who so greatly resembles Carole Lombard, be the next Mrs. Gable? Or is the King through with marriage at last?

The MacRaes wanted a New England farmhouse painted red, but one look at this southern Colonial mansion changed their minds. It has 12 rooms, five baths and a pool heated for year-round swimming.

Portraits of the three children—a Father's Day surprise for Gordon—dominate a wall in the living room. Early American antiques collected by Gordon over a nine-year period reflect his Yankee tastes.

The master bedroom is in a wing by itself and opens onto a patio. Because of its large size, Sheila furnished it as a sitting room by grouping easy chairs for conversation and using strong colors.

The pine-panelled living room is large and uncluttered. A foyer separates it from the dining room which is also furnished with American antiques. Gordon recalls where he bought every one of the antique pieces.

THEY MEET AT GORDON MACRAE'S HOME IN A PERFECT BLEND OF YANKEE TASTE AND SOUTHERN COMFORT

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

■ A few weeks ago the Gordon MacRaes decided to throw a small party to show off their new home. "Nothing very large," Sheila explained. "Just the Jeff Chandlers, Doris Day and Marty, the Gene Nelsons, and maybe one other couple."

"Okay with me," Gordon agreed. "Just let's keep it down."

Came party night, and the first dozen guests filled the MacRae driveway to capacity. The car overflow stretched a quarter of a mile down the valley road and the large southern Colonial house was bulging with people.

With the arrival of each guest, three little MacRae heads would pop over the bannister to drink in the newcomer. On this house-warming occasion, Meredith 7, Heather 5, and Gar 3, had been granted special bedtime extensions. They could sit on the top step until the last person arrived. And from experience, the children knew this was a winning game. Whenever Sheila and Gordon MacRae give a party, they start by inviting a few old-time friends and wind up with 30 or 40 more from the Hollywood younger set.

What puzzles Sheila is that "they all turn out to be close friends of ours. And they all simply love to play 'The Game'."

"The Game" in Hollywood, in case you don't know, is charades. The MacRae version is a slight variation of the ordinary game in which one person silently acts out a song title, quotation or slogan. The MacRaes take two teams in separate rooms with an arbiter in the center. The teams enact the same list of charades, and as (Continued on next page) the members guess one puzzler, the umpire gives them a new one. The game becomes a relay race. The first team to finish the charades list wins the game.

A satisfactory physical set-up for relay charades consists of two large, soundproof rooms with a middle ground for the umpire.

The night of the MacRae house-warming, Sheila figured she and Gordon could use the pine-panelled living room for one team and the dining room with its comfortable Windsor chairs with the foyer in between. As the guests stepped in the front door, Gordy offered each one a playing card, and the teams were chosen according to black and red cards. Some of the crowd, like Jeff and Marge Chandler, brought along a list of tough charades.

The buffet dinner of turkey, ham, fried chicken, sweet potatoes, peas, salad, dessert and coffee was just a prelude to "The Game." Immediately after coffee, the teams separated, and the race was on. The non-professional actors, being less conscious of dramatics, did as well as the $2,000-a-week players on (Continued on page 87)

Vittorio Gassmann, the Italian actor, swept Shelley off her feet in Italy

It took a Continental charmer to teach Shelley about love. Now with her heart in Europe, she says, "Farl's just a pal."

Returning from Europe with Farley (who starred with her in Behave Yourself), Shelley said, "We were never engaged, never in love."

didn't marry farley

by Hedda Hopper

■ A man once said: "Shelley Winters is the kind of girl all men would be afraid of but few would run away from."

He can say that again! What with the number and variety of beaus Shelley's had during her four years in Hollywood, you get dizzy just counting. But of them all, Farley Granger was the boy Hollywood always thought most likely to succeed matrimonially.

Yet Shelley came back from a six weeks tour of Paris, London, Rome and Israel without a wedding ring. Farley had done double duty as escort and guide on the trip everyone thought would turn out to be a honeymoon.

Most surprising of all, Shelley was bursting with a new romance. Vittorio Gassmann, the Italian actor, had dried her tears as she got on the plane, had filled her arms with yellow roses, had said the romantic things American boys don't say. He had, in short, swept the volatile Shelley right off her feet and she wanted to tell the world about him!

But when Shelley came down the plane ramp in her Paris clothes to face the photographers and newsmen, everyone asked her the same question: "Why didn't you marry Farley Granger over there?" And of course it was the very first question I asked her.

Shelley, who wanted to tell of the new love and the new way of living she'd discovered abroad, threw up her hands:

"Farley and I didn't get married," she said, "because we were never engaged. That's why. Before we left I told everyone we weren't engaged, we weren't going to marry. Did they believe us? Of course not. We got to New York and the studio had adjoining rooms for us in the same hotel—I guess everyone thought we'd run for a justice of the peace first thing. Farley moved down to another floor. The more we said we were just pals, the more convinced everyone became that we were just trying to stall."

I said, "You had a ring. You've been engaged for two years."

"You're wrong," Shelley protested. "We never have been engaged. Farley gave me a little cocktail ring and Jerry Wald announced we were engaged and I denied it. We're only good friends. You can't be good friends and be in love. When you see two people laughing together all the time, sharing things and sharing friends, they're pals. When they're always asking for little tables in dark corners and sitting eyeing each other in gloomy silence—that's love."

I said, "Tell me honestly, did Farley ever propose?"

Shelley debated over that one. "Mmmmm, not really."

Then I asked her the 64 dollar question. "Do you ever intend to marry him?"

Shelley said, "I don't think so . . . But then, you never know. You know how changeable I am."

That left a wide loophole for future eventualities. I asked her, "What made love fly out the window?" She countered quickly, "It didn't—we're still good friends. He has telephoned me from New York—he knows about Vittorio but it hasn't made any difference with us. I expect to see him and have good times with him. You see we were never really in love. We tried to be because everyone else thought we should be. But we've got something unique—we're real friends—not many men and women have that. Farley's the best kind of company and such fun to go out with."

Shelley admits she's changeable, her admirers say she's volatile which is the gay alibi for changing your mind frequently. Sometimes the people who work in pictures with her say she's a witch and that they'll never have her in a film again. This means they only stay mad at her until they need her for one of her wonderful sexy roles. Then they kiss and make up to get her back again. But Shelley doesn't think of herself (Continued on page 93)

what is Tony Curtis really like?

■ "But what is he really like?" the girl sitting next to me in the club car asked when she discovered I knew Tony Curtis.

"Well," I said, "he's terribly talented but he's undisciplined." Then I told her about the "Inside U.I." show. Once a year, in order to give experience to their younger players, Universal-International presents a group of acts for the press. Tony was all over the place at the last show, but his greatest moment came when he did a scene from All You Need Is One Good Break. Talent and vitality just oozed out of him, almost to excess. He was so eager to please he killed himself. Although there was one boy in the show who was actually better as far as technique went, it was Tony you looked at. He made you look at him. For whatever it is that makes a star Tony has it.

Tony, himself, isn't aware of his abilities. Like all naturals, and Tony is a natural, he knows he wants a lot. "Dear God," he has said aloud, with every nerve in his body quivering, "Dear God, give me one chance."

While they were rehearsing for the "Inside U.I." show the director had to make him stop work. He wanted to keep right on rehearsing. Whatever Tony does he does big. When he took dancing lessons (along with voice, painting and diction lessons) he rounded up a lot of studio executives and gave a dance recital. He just wanted to show them what he could do. When it was over one of the execs said, "Technique he hasn't got, but he makes every other hoofer (Continued on page 89)

SHE ALWAYS WEARS A SMILE, SHE'S

■ Hundreds of stories have been written about June Allyson, and the majority of them have been gay and breezy, reflecting her personality. Many a writer, however, has finished an interview with June and gone home feeling puzzled, aware that there was something beneath her laughter that he couldn't quite define, and when he finished his story, he knew he hadn't caught the whole girl. He couldn't know that June's gaiety was a camouflage for her own unhappiness.

To people who have felt that June Ally-

EFFICIENT HOUSEKEEPER NOW, she was too scared as a bride to accept housekeeping responsibilities, made many humorous but painful (for her) domestic blunders.

A DEVOTED MOTHER, she is determined to give her children, Pam, and Richard (shown above at his christening) the safe, secure childhood she never experienced herself.

SELF-CONFIDENT AND HAPPY AT LAST, June has finally won the battle against her own fears. The Powell foursome is one of the most contented in Hollywood—and Dick proudly says of June: "She's a first-rate wife, mother and house mouse!"

June has ought it alone because essentially she is a nely person who prefers to keep her roubles to herself. This story is told now nly because June is beginning to know that ie has won her battle.

Since she can remember, June has struged against shyness, fear and uncertainty, id against the black, depressive moods that escended upon her without warning.

Her innate character is responsible for some of it, and the rest can be chalked up to her childhood. Without pretending a knowledge of psycho-analysis, it is easy to see that a childhood like June's would not tend to result in secure adulthood. There was no serious lack of material comfort, but there was a lack of love in her early years and the absence of a good home life.

June's father left their home when she was still an infant. Stranded with no source of income, her mother took a job as an engraver in a printing shop. Of necessity, June was left with relatives while a baby, and left alone when she grew old enough to attend school.

Other children went home from school to warm kitchens and were given cookies and milk by their mothers, but June went home alone to an empty apartment, wishing that she, too, could have a mother waiting for her. She was told about Jack the Ripper and cautioned never to open the door for anyone, and many an afternoon locked herself in the bathroom, trembling with (Continued on page 61)

"He's affected," they say. "Nobody can be that eccentric." Oh, no? Marlon doesn't even try to be a character—he just is one!

BY STEVE CRONIN

■ The average new motion picture star descends on Hollywood like a thunderbolt—or, at least, a visiting Maharajah. He is catapulted into the town from a long sling, released by a dozen husky press agents, or he is lifted from a train at Pasadena by a cheering squad and a brass band. An entrance without such hullabaloo is considered almost indecent.

But consider the case of Marlon Brando. After dawdling around New York nagged by the feeling that he had a date somewhere, Marlon Brando suddenly remembered it was in Hollywood—to make a movie. He walked into the nearest transportation office, took the first accommodation suggested and reached Hollywood a few days later in a coach car, slouched in the seat where he had slept for three nights. By his side was a battered suit case he had borrowed and as the train pulled into the station, he was lunching handsomely on a banana.

At that moment, the publicity department of Stanley Kramer productions was in a dither. Brando was due, but they hadn't heard from him. His agent couldn't help, he didn't know where the actor was, either. So the result was: no catapult, no brass band and no explosion. Marlon Brando got off the train, boarded a bus, rode to the studio, walked into the office and politely asked where he should go to dress for work.

The Kramer organization never got over it. They have told the story time and again, until today when you mention Brando's name in Hollywood, the first thing anyone says is:

"Brando! That guy must be nuts!"

But he is not. Marlon Brando is essentially an intellectual, a serious-minded artist, a talent. But he is childlike in his evaluations. Although he is an actor, there is not a pretentious bone in his body. Whatever he does, he does because he thinks it is the proper thing to do at the moment, and he does nothing for effect or to earn a reputation as a character. In looking back on the events that have taken place during (Continued on page 74)

no more tears for Judy!

She sat on the edge of the stage like a ragged urchin and she sang "Over The Rainbow" the way only Garland can . . .

BY JIM BURTON

■ One night this winter a typical Broadway character was taking his midnight stroll down New York's main stem when he saw a crowd of a couple of hundred people gathered before the entrance of the Palace Theater in Times Square.

Naturally, he joined the throng and, with the rest, peered into the dark lobby of the closed house. After a time he grew restless, so he turned to a neighbor.

"What are we all waiting for, Bud?" he asked.

"Judy Garland," said the other man. "She ought to be coming out any minute now."

The fellow looked over the crowd which was made up of well dressed, middle-aged folks. They stood quietly, as though waiting for a friend.

"This is the wrong place," said the Broadway character. "The actors always come out the stage door around the corner."

"Not Judy," said the other man. "She comes out this way every night. I've seen her three times this week."

The native shrugged his shoulders and walked away. "I don't get it," he said. "This never happened around here before."

And he was right. It hadn't happened around Broadway before. The stars of the Big Street had for generations sneaked out of the theaters through the back entrances and scurried to waiting cars along dimly-lit alleys. They had dodged the well wishers, not made dates with them.

Almost on the stroke of 12, the front door of the Palace opened and Judy Garland, surrounded by half a dozen of her company, walked through. The crowd surged forward slightly but didn't crush. Judy had a big smile on (Continued on next page)

"Legs" Garland rocked the rafters with this re-creation of her "Get Happy" number from the movie Summer Stock. Brilliantly staged in the "Two-a-day" Palace revival, this was one of the show's high points.

"We're a coupla swells," sing Judy and Jack McClendon as they go through the last routine (Judy sang it with Astaire in Easter Parade). She closed the show in this costume.

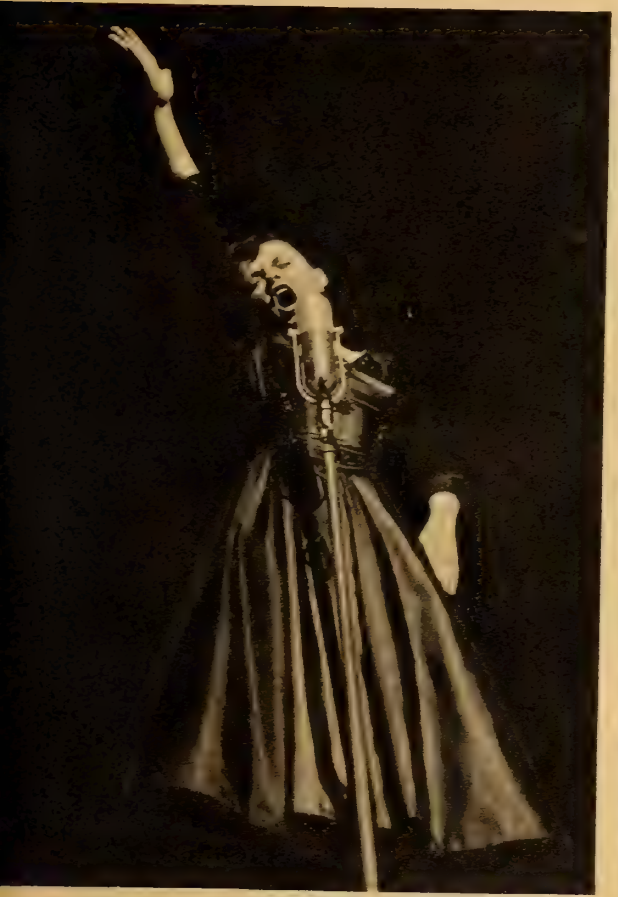
her face and as she moved to the curb she acknowledged, with a handshake or a small bow, all the greetings extended her. Someone hailed a cab for her and before she pulled away, Judy waved, blew a kiss and said thanks to everyone. It was a touching but orderly demonstration. And, as the man said, it had never happened on Broadway before.



Judy Garland's engagement at the Palace Theater in New York proved one thing for certain. You'll never have to cry for her again. It proved to the people of America that Judy Garland's talent transcends any entertainment medium; that if, as they say, she can't work in pictures again, she can play in any hall, tent, barn or on any street corner in the land and be a star. It proved that Judy Garland, at a bare 30, is the one artist of our era who has achieved the stature of the beloved stars of the past generations. She makes them stand up and cheer at an age when most of the others were just getting started.

The road to her triumph has not been easy. It has been rutted with tracings of disgrace, heartbreak, and near scandal. The days from her tearful departure from MGM to her opening night at the Palace were filled with dread and uncertainty, and illness and loneliness have been with her constantly. How did she make it?

It all began, really, before she left the studio which had been her home for most of her life. Judy's relations with the front office were, to put it mildly, strained. She had been unable to work regularly in her last three pictures. She was too heavy, always, it seemed, on the starting date of a new film. She couldn't sleep without sedatives and she had no energy without a daytime stimulant. Everything was wrong with Judy.

While the newspapers had a field day covering the fracas between a major corporation and a small girl, the small girl was almost at the end of her rope. As far as MGM was concerned, it was a purely impersonal matter, but with Judy it was more. She had at stake not only her career but the understanding and friendship of millions of people who had been staunch supporters since she was a kid. Her only hiding place was in the companionship of fellow (Continued on page 83)

HER SHOES . . . AND SHE PACKED THEM IN ON BROADWAY FOR ONE OF THE BIGGEST HITS OF THE YEAR!

Belting "Love Is Sweeping the Country" right into the balcony, a perspiring Judy, in stocking feet, got the rhythm and then she really went to town.

Marlene Dietrich was one of the many glittering first-nighters who came backstage after cheering, weeping, applauding and begging for more. Celebrities jammed the opening, but only Judy Garland was the star.

Surrounded by flowers on opening night, Judy later spent hours reading congratulatory telegrams. She was great—and grateful!

■ "Won't you sing something for us?"

I can still see myself, fresh from the hinterlands, standing there at my first cocktail party in New York and feeling my throat tighten up at the request. I didn't want to sing. I was afraid. Then I told myself I must. As casually as they had asked . . . I must sing. Not just because there was a theatrical producer present who was casting a show at the time, but because I had chosen this fascinating, smart world as my world. Either I lived up to it at this very moment, or I faded back . . . and out.

I sang. And it was more a personal triumph than a professional one. It was true that Felix Brentano signed me for his musical, Mr. Strauss Goes To Boston, and from this show I went into the movies. But what was more important, I overcame my fear, felt confidence flow into me, and knew that I was no longer the timid, unsure girl my mother had unintentionally raised me to be.

Mother's heart was full of devotion for me, yet such were her ideas that the teen-age phase of my development was slowed down. I wasn't permitted to think of makeup, clothes fads were banned, and until I finished high school I had practically no personal liberty.

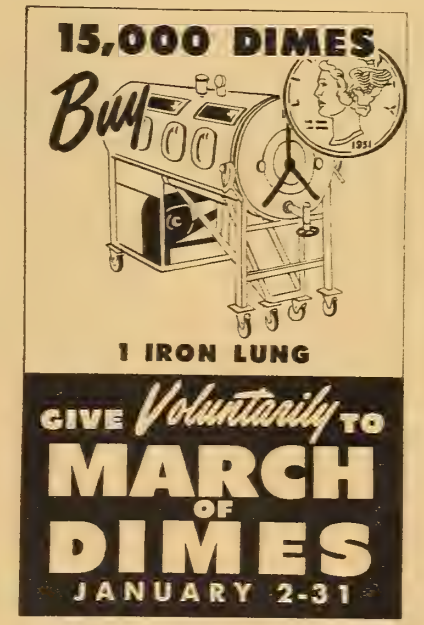
Her mother worked hard six days a week, and, wearied of the din in the printing shop, sometimes went out during the evenings. On these occasions she left her niece as guardian of the apartment and tucked June into bed before leaving to visit the neighbors, admonishing her to go to sleep and not be afraid. June's cousin was a girl not much older than she, and was little help to the child lying awake in the small, darkened bedroom. Every creak of the tenement's old boards, every swish of the wind outside her window, would send the small girl to an upright position, straining to see through the blackness and quivering with the fright that only a lonely child can know.



JUNE'S only source of companionship was the neighborhood children, and although shy, she had just begun making a few friends when a serious accident happened. A falling tree limb sent her sprawling, fractured her spine and killed the little pup that had been her constant companion. For a child of eight years, June showed remarkable courage in refusing to accept the doctors' pessimistic outlook. She would walk again, and she did. It was after her discharge from the hospital, her back tightly encased in a steel brace that reached below her hips, that she developed an even greater shyness. The brace made her terribly self-conscious and the neighborhood children, with the unconscious cruelty of the young, now regarded June as a freak. They wanted to touch the brace, to see how it was strapped to her body, and June backed away from them with fear in her eyes. For the next few years normal play was impossible for her, and she sat on the front steps, watching the other kids play hopscotch and blind man's buff, aching in her heart because she was not included. And always, when in a crowd, she would shy away from people, frightened that they would come in contact with the hard brace and turn to stare at her.

When she was 12 years old she weighed only 42 pounds, but now free of the loathsome brace, she determined to take the doctors' advice and learn to swim, an exercise which they had promised would strengthen her back muscles. In the public school there was a swimming teacher named Marie Spinoza. Although barely out of her 'teens, Marie was a sensitive person and realized June's great need for companionship. She devoted much of her time to the younger girl. She was the first real friend June had ever had, and in gratitude June attacked the job of learning to swim with such diligence that before long she had won a New York City free-style swimming championship.

The conquest gave her needed courage, and she went on to learn dancing by religious attendance of Fred Astaire movies. How June broke into show business by accepting the dares of her schoolmates has been told before. She had spoken so much of having mastered Astaire's dances that she had to accept the challenge to get into a Broadway show before she was out of high school. What hasn't been told is her acute fright at appearing before an audience. She was proud, certainly, before that opening night, but even though she was to appear surrounded by other chorus girls, although she was to be one of many, her heart thumped alarmingly at the mere thought. As it turned out, her fears were well grounded, for that opening night of Sing Out The News provided June with an experience that would have turned most young girls away from the stage forever.

She was 15 at the time, and because she had lied about her age in order to get the job, was in no position to be spotlighted or undergo any inquiries. She had therefore remained what she was, a quiet, scared kid, and when the curtain went up she danced onto the stage with the others, an automaton going through her routine with studied concentration. All went well until the end of the dance, when the line of chorus girls was scheduled to back into the bowels of the stage and there end their number. The line backed, all but June, who became confused and went once more toward the footlights. The curtain swung together in back of her and she was left, completely alone, facing a sea of staring eyes.

Being unable to find the separation in a stage curtain is a shattering experience even for a seasoned entertainer, but to a child of 15, it was a situation that warranted a storm of tears. June laughs about it today, treating it as one of the most amusing moments of her life, but if you pin her down she'll admit that it wasn't at all funny. She showed the courage that night that has eventually made her a top star—the courage and the intelligence. She tried a buck-and-wing to the left side of the stage, but there was no exit. The audience was completely silent, no doubt in sympathy for the tiny girl who was so obviously nonplussed. June's heart was pounding with fright, and as she began a hopeless buck-and-wing to the right she also began talking to herself. "You've got to do something," she said. "Something. Be funny. That's it—be funny!" She started to clown and kept it up with the accompaniment of a bewildered orchestra until the curtain finally opened and allowed her to slip back into oblivion. Out front, the audience was still howling and applauding, and most of them probably thought that the kid without billing had given them a scheduled comedy act.

This particular happening in June's life taught her the lesson she's applied so often since. She found that if you're frightened and are able to cover up with gaiety, no one will ever know. That is why people today who have known her for years realize that though they see her often, though she is warm and generous and fun to be with, June is hard to know and has never really opened her heart to them.

SHE began to use gaiety as a defense weapon, and soon it seemed that June was almost always in a merry mood. No one knew about the times she went to the other extreme and sat alone for hours on end, swallowed in the depths of depression brought on by lack of faith in herself. Everyone found her gaiety infectious and a pace-setter in a room filled with people, but the people closest to her could detect a difference. If she was really carefree at the moment, it was pure merriment, bubbling from her personality, but if she was covering her discomfort, it was too fast, too high, and verging on giddiness. People meeting her for the first time were the audience for the latter type, for deep down June was terrified of meeting strangers and always had been. Her public appearances were tinged with it, for it was then that she was camouflaging her fright, straining for a lightness she did not feel.

Once, during World War II, June was scheduled to appear at a canteen in San Francisco, where she had been visiting the soldiers in hospitals. A friend who had accompanied her stood backstage with June waiting with her for her cue, and was astonished when June began working her hands in a nervous gesture.

"What's the matter with you?" asked the friend.

"I can't do it," June said. "I can't do it."

"But," said the friend, "you're used to this sort of thing!"

At that moment June heard her cue and before going on-stage thrust her hand into her friend's, who was dumfounded to find it was wringing wet. It was even a greater surprise to peep out from the wings and see June clowning all over the stage as though she'd been looking forward to the event for weeks.

While working in New York, June had met a boy from a good family who was also in show business. Tommy showed her the ropes, told her how to treat business people, took her to good restaurants for dinner, explained the French on the menus, pointed out her oyster fork and the correct manner with waiters. It was a boost in the right direction and a big help to June who'd had no contact with the grand life.

She came to Hollywood alone, hating every minute of the train ride, and unable to bring herself to speak to strangers. After her arrival she rented a small apartment and lived alone. Daytime was all right, for she was at the studio every day, taking lessons and rehearsing. But the nights were bad. Before many weeks had passed, the neighbors across the hall were surprised by a knock on their door around midnight. They opened it to find June, whom they know only slightly, standing in the hall with a robe thrown over her pajamas. Her face was pale, her eyes wide.

"I'm—awfully sorry," she said, "but I can't sleep in my apartment, alone. Could I—would I be putting you to any inconvenience if I just curled up here on your couch?"

After a while, the Downings got used to it. Most nights June managed to sleep through the silence, but often she went across the hall and slept the night in the neighbors' living room, leaving before they were awake. It was the Downings who insisted that June should have a companion, and eventually suggested Bess Van Dyke, who remained June's housekeeper until her marriage to Dick Powell.

June was charmed by Dick, who seemed gentle and understanding, but she knew him a long time before she could relax in his company. Often when they were out and laughing together the realization would suddenly cross her mind that this man was Dick Powell, a man so big and important in the movie world that he couldn't possibly be interested in her. At times she even suspected that he was laughing at her because of the inadequacies she imagined herself to be burdened with. Before long she knew she was in love with him, but talked little about it to other people. She didn't know how to go about gauging his affection for her, and always quiet about her personal affairs, had no intention of letting anyone know about her feelings. Dick did laugh at her, but his amusement stemmed only from the fact that June is an unconscious comedienne. He still tells with delight of the evening she asked him in a stiff little voice about his intentions.

It was amusing on the surface, but underneath it was a little sad. Many of the Allyson antics have been written into comedy copy, with no mention made of the inferiority complex that was gnawing away at her. Going along with the gag, June herself would tell the latest anecdote as the funniest thing that ever happened. Things like her near-prostration before her wedding when Dick was a few minutes late. Hilarious, everybody said, but few knew that upstairs, in Bunny Green's bedroom, hooking and unhooking her jacket, June flew to the window every two minutes to look for Dick's car, certain in her heart that this man couldn't possibly love her. Their honeymoon on the boat—June doing everything wrong with sails and lines and anchor and cooking, and Dick amused at the fun she made of her own mistakes, and June desperate inside with her own clumsiness. Her efforts at home-making were chronicled with delight by Hollywood scribes. She had bought single blankets for a double bed, and regular pillow slips for a bolster. She had no money sense whatsoever, and for Christmas bought her new husband an exquisite writing case made of silver, a priceless thing that Dick asked her to return for something more practical. When he tackled a remodeling or decorating problem and asked for June's opinion, she never had any. "Whatever you think, dear," she would say. And Dick, not understanding, would tease her about her lack of imagination, her fear of responsibility. June had imagination, she wanted to help, but she was afraid she would blunder again and so remained silent about her opinions. So well did she keep her fears to herself that Dick hadn't a glimmer of her misgivings, and more than two years of their marriage went by before he began to understand that June's hypochondria (also written about as laughable) was a direct result of her quiet worry that she was incompetent in her new identity as Mrs. Richard Powell.

WHEN Dick bought the big English house in which they now live, June was unhappy about the move. She had spent a year in the Brentwood house and had finally become accustomed to the simple elegance of its furnishings. To her, every wall in the house and every stick of furniture represented security, for although still unsure, she had come to know it as home and had grown to be fairly competent at managing the house. She had even bought a complete set of dinnerware of which Dick had wholeheartedly approved, and it was her pride and joy because she had finally done something right. With the move imminent, Dick began thinking of new furniture to fit the bigger house, and June felt her world was coming to an end. She pleaded and coaxed until Dick, although not yet realizing her basic reason, agreed to keep everything they already had, adding only the necessary pieces.

That last remark managed to hold June together, and she went on trying. With the new house came the responsibility of hiring new help, and June wilted under it. She talked to the secretary of Dick's business manager. "Pat, I wonder if—do you suppose you could help me find somebody? I'm not very good at those things. If you can find a few couples and sift out the ones you think might be good, I'll interview them after you."

It was a big plunge for a girl who had collected firewood for the coal stove as a child, who had pressed her own clothes back at the Women's Club in New York, who had always been terrified of the first time she would come face to face with a real-life butler. The fame and fortune of Hollywood is a big plunge for all its successful people who have come from the labor ranks of department stores and factories. But few of them have been handicapped, as was June, by an utter lack of self confidence, by a conviction that she was unworthy of anyone's love.

She is one of those actresses who is sensitive to others and feels deeply that she can forget herself in the portrayal of a role, but facing people as herself is the most difficult chore in life for her. In the beginning, in Hollywood, she had little faith in her ability and took sincere praise as out-and-out flattery. Years after the accident and the surgery that necessitated shaving her head and stitching her face, she seldom looked in a mirror that tears didn't come into her eyes, and even today she is puzzled when people compliment her on her appearance.

Before her marriage to Dick she had confined herself to a handful of close friends, few of whom were names in the industry and none of whom were in an upper social or financial bracket. With these people she knew she could be herself, without pretension and without airs, but when she became Mrs. Powell and was brought into contact with Dick's friends—all older, influential people, she felt she must act differently. Why or how, she didn't know, but she knew that as Dick's wife she must somehow learn to please them.

In more than six years of marriage, June has gradually come to know that Dick's friends are real, down-to-earth people, despite their exalted place in Hollywood society. She has learned that they love her for what she is, not for what she had thought she must be. If she wants to let that raucous laugh carom around her own house or somebody else's house, they love it. If she wants to take off her shoes, she does it with the sympathetic approval of her hosts, and whether or not a butler is standing at her elbow.

The affection shown her by Dick's friends has been instrumental in the fact that June has slowly found herself, is beginning to realize that in her own right she is a rather wise and self-reliant person. She has a husband she adores, two wonderful children, good health; in short, everything anyone could ask for, and after years of telling herself how lucky she is, she has begun to admit that if she has all these things, there must be a reason for it. It is doubtful if June has come right out and told herself what a smart cookie she is, but the suspicion has at least entered her mind.

AT THE party given by June and Dick on their sixth wedding anniversary, and following Ricky's christening, there was no one happier than June. It wasn't so much the anniversary or that her son had been christened; it was that Mrs. Richard Powell, for the first time, had planned and worked on a big Hollywood party all by herself. She had designed the decorations, planned the menu and hired the musicians. It was a lovely party and everybody said so, and June beamed back at them, feeling that at last she was competent, that the days of bungling things were gone forever.

Two weeks later, she and Dick went to look at a house. It was the first time in their marriage that he had been able to convince June that she could be happy in new surroundings, and she had agreed with him that their present house was too big and too elegant for their mutual taste. So they got into Dick's convertible and drove around the winding roads of Bel-Air until they came to the house they were looking for. It was half the size of their own place, with a cozy look about it. In the living room, Dick turned to say something to June and found she was gone. She emerged a minute later from an adjoining room.

"I've been thinking," she said. "There's a fireplace in that other room, too, and if we could knock down this wall—say from here to there—we'd have a bigger room and a double fireplace. And upstairs we'd need bigger closets, and if we could build a little guest house for the help, it'd give us—"

She stopped short, noticing the astonishment on Dick's face.

"What's the matter?" she said.

He put an arm around her waist. "I don't know whether or not you realize it, my girl, but you've emerged as a first-rate mother, wife, and house mouse. And when we do choose a house, I'm going to make you the foreman." Then he bent down and kissed her, right in front of the real estate salesman.

They've called her the happy heart, likened her to a sunbeam, said June is the word for happiness, yet all these years she has been concealing one of the heftiest inferiority complexes Hollywood has ever known. It's all right now, and when June is gay these days, it's purely and simply because she is, in her own mind, confident, happy, and secure. THE END

Gable was raised by his grandparents until he was four when his father, an oil man, married Jennie Dunlap. Gable, Sr. moved the family to Hopedale, a community of 500 which is ten miles from Cadiz, Ohio; and it was here that Clark spent his youth.

His step-mother, whom he idolized, died when he was 15, and the boy was without a mother again.

Gable very rarely talks about his youth, and this is understandable, because it wasn't a very happy time. What he likes to remember most about it is his step-mother whom he once described as "the tenderest human being I have ever known."

The night she died, her stepson's youth died with her; ever since then he has had only the memory of her loveliness and a sub-conscious desire to re-create her image in the women he later married.

GABLE'S professional career is undoubtedly one of the most successful any actor has ever enjoyed, but his personal life continues to be tinged with tragedy. He continues to search for the perfect combination of mother-wife. He found her once in the form of Carole Lombard, but here death snatched her away. It is highly doubtful if he will ever again discover Carole's rare qualities in any one woman.

He is not through looking, however, and despite his protestation: "It will be a long time before I get married again, if ever," the chances are that Gable will some day take a fifth wife because he knows he can't live alone.

A few years ago Gable was asked what sort of women he preferred. "I like the sophisticated type," he admitted. "The sophisticated woman is more interesting. She has more to offer. She has had experience with life and men. She has seen more, heard more and is consequently more amusing. As far as I'm concerned, the demure little girl is a very dull proposition. Give me the older woman who knows what it's all about."

As any psychiatrist would point out, there lies implicit in this statement the sublimated desire for a mother-substitute.

There is nothing shameful or unmanly about a grown-up male who seeks a mature woman to provide him with the mother-love he went without as a child. Unless you understand that, there is no possibility of understanding Clark's various marriages and eventual divorces.

Put yourself in his position when he was 15. Here's a poor boy with a grade school education who doesn't want to work on his father's farm at Ravenna, 60 miles north of Hopedale.

Instead, he gets in touch with Andy Means, a chum from Hopedale, and against his father's wishes, he packs his straw suitcase, makes three sandwiches, and sets out for Akron seeking a job.

In Akron, he goes to work in the Firestone plant molding treads on tires. He also attends night school, and on one occasion, he sees his first play, Bird of Paradise. Fascinated by the theatrical life, he takes a non-salaried job as call-boy. But soon his money runs out, and in answer to a letter from his father who has gone to work in the Oklahoma oil fields, young Gable joins him and signs on as a tool dresser at $12 a day.

This is more money than the youngster has ever earned in his life, but he's unhappy. He has no one to turn to, no woman to whom he can explain his newfound enthusiasm for the theater, his new passion for acting, his desperate hunger for show business.

What does he do? He leaves the oil fields and joins the Jewell Players, a tent-show company where he drives the stakes in the morning, plays the cornet in the band before the show starts and then hurries to dress up and become an actor. All this for ten bucks a week.

"Of course, we went broke." Gable recalls. "The final blow came in Butte, Montana. It was March and as cold as Greenland. I knew nothing about mining, and no one would give me a job. I didn't have a cent for railroad fare.

"One night I talked to some hoboes. They told me there was a frieght train going through that night to Oregon. I hopped it, and it was just my luck that it happened to be a fast fruit train. Every car was sealed. I had to lie flat on top of the car hanging on as best I could. I've never been so cold in my life."

In Oregon, Gable went to work as a lumberjack, a hop picker, a necktie salesman, and a member of the Portland Oregonian's circulation department. He also fell in love. The girl's name was Franz Doerfler, and she lived in Portland. She is never mentioned in any of his biographies, but she was his first sweetheart.

AS a matter of fact, if Clark hadn't been accused by a deluded young woman of having fathered her child, it is highly doubtful if the world would ever have learned about Miss Franz Doerfler. For Gable, ever the gallant, has always been extremely secretive about his love-life.

WHO'RE YOU FOOLING?

I adore Pat's family, which consists of one mother, one father, one brother, one sister. When I get mad, I pull a line he loves: "I'm going home to Mother —your mother." Which shows how mad I get. He never gets mad—not at me, anyway. After more than four years together, I can't think when we've really had a fight. Our relationship's based on the open deal, openly arrived at. Whatever's on my mind I tell Pat, and he does the same with me, so there's no need to worry about anything coming between us. He says he has me fooled, because I think nothing's wrong with him. He doesn't have me fooled. There just is nothing wrong with him.

—Mona Freeman

In 1937, however, a Canadian girl began writing Clark, accusing him of being the father of her 13-year-old girl. In court, later, she elaborated on the details, explaining that she had given birth to her daughter in 1922 "when Clark Gable was with me in England."

Clark realized early in the game that the girl was a bit "off her rocker," and promptly turned her letters over to the proper authorities. "I preferred to let the whole case drop," he confided later, "but the U. S. Attorney asked me to testify on behalf of the Government. They felt they had a good extortion case and didn't want to drop it."

In his testimony, the handsome actor swore that in 1922 he was broke and living in Oregon. He said there were persons who could substantiate that.

One of these was his Oregon sweetheart of 1922, Franz Doerfler, a tall, plain, shy woman who took the stand and promptly testified that Clark had been courting her in Portland all during the time he allegedly was in England with the Canadian woman.

The wacky female who had written Gable so threateningly was convicted of extortion and sentenced to one year in jail. Franz Doerfler returned to Portland never to be heard from again.

In contrast to Miss Doerfler, the one woman who is prominently mentioned in all Gable biographies is his first wife, Josephine Dillon.

Clark met her when he was 23, and she was 40. He met her in Portland when he applied for an acting job with The Little Theater. Josephine Dillon was a dramatic coach who had been imported by the Chamber of Commerce from Los Angeles to stage the Oregon Rose Festival. She took an immediate liking to young Gable and even suggested that he come down to Los Angeles and try his hand at the movies.

"I had two dollars and one suit," Gable recalls, "and I sat up all the way on the train from Portland to Los Angeles. When I arrived in town the only prospect I had was of starving to death."

But Josephine wouldn't let Gable starve. She was sure he had enough talent to make the grade, and undertook to coach him. In the process they fell in love and were married at the Hollywood Presbyterian Church on December 13, 1924. Miss Dillon's family was outraged by the news. It was a fairly prominent Los Angeles family—her father had been district attorney of the county—and in the seven years she was married to Gable, her family refused to have anything to do with her.

"Clark and I rented a little house on Harold Way," Miss Dillon recalls. "We had hardly any money, but we worked long hours. Clark studied all the time. I tried incessantly to find work for him. I went and saw Virginia Mathes who used to be in charge of the Rudolph Valentino pictures, and I asked her to give Clark a chance. She said to send him around, but when she saw him, she cried, 'Oh, my God! No. Not that yokel!' I tried to get him extra work at $1.50 a day plus lunch, but hardly anyone would have him. He never gave up. I have never met anyone who wanted so desperately to be an actor. Finally, a Hollywood agent, Jack Sherrill, sent him to Houston to work in a stock company, and it was there that he met the woman who was to become his second wife."

The divorce mess with Sylvia Ashley is old pickings to Gable. In order to free himself of his second wife, Maria Langham, he had to go through the same legal hassel. Ria, so the story goes, had divorced her husband in order to marry Gable in 1931. She was 11 years older than Gable, and was soon to become a grandmother, but she and Gable were madly in love, and it had to be marriage.

Josephine Dillon divorced Clark, and since he had no money back then, that's exactly what she got as a settlement.

Gable and Ria Langham separated in 1935. Clark took a flying trip down to South America where he was mobbed by the ladies and returned aboard a steamship where he engaged in a small romance with a dancer named Della Carrol.

When the boat docked and Gable was asked about the romance, he said, "I'm sorry, but I don't recall anyone by that name. Did you say Della Carrol?"

Gable always denies romances. He also denies separations, divorces and romantic entanglements.

Miss Carrol, however, wasn't sufficiently acquainted with Clark's ways, and when reporters told her that Clark couldn't even recall her name, she was hurt. "I'm surprised to think that he could say a thing like that," she complained. "Of course he knows my name. The ship's purser introduced us. Clark called me Della at first. other, he called me Irish. Maybe he doesn't want the publicity. I don't blame him. I'm not mad. Just hurt. I still think, though, that he's the most divine man I ever met . . . a marvelous lover. But from here on, he'll have to run after me. It's foolish for a girl to pursue a man, even a man like Clark who spoils you for other men."

Clark didn't run after Della one bit. When he landed in New York, he told reporters that he had separated from his second wife, Mrs. Maria Gable. "I'm not the easiest person in the world to live with," he gallantly confessed. "And I admit it. Sometimes I wonder how I get along with myself. Eight weeks ago when I left for South America I knew this separation was coming. We've made a property settlement. There's absolutely no animosity between Mrs. Gable and myself but there's no chance for a reconciliation."

Gable said that in 1935. How history repeats itself! In 1951, he told reporters concerning his divorce from Sylvia Ashley, "There's absolutely no animosity between Mrs. Gable and myself but there's no chance for a reconciliation."

There is never any animosity between Gable and his wives, but somehow, they always wind up in long legal fights.

In 1936, when Clark started to go around with Carole Lombard, he filed suit in Superior Court against Maria Gable for interpretation of a property settlement. Gable said in his complaint that he and his wife had signed a property settlement in 1935 providing for a division of community property. "But recently," Gable told the court, "Mrs. Gable informed me that she refuses to be bound by the agreement and intends to breach it."

The story about Gable's second wife is that while Clark was still a relatively unknown stage actor in New York, she had introduced him to the right people. She is even credited in some sources with having gotten Clark his first Metro raise from $350 to $500 a week. Anyway, they were married after Gable signed his first Hollywood contract. The marriage lasted only four years, but Mrs. Gable would not give Clark a divorce until 1939. They were separated for four years, and according to intimates, Clark settled close to a half million dollars on his second bride before she would give him his freedom to marry Carole Lombard, who was really the great love of his life.

In December of 1938, Gable said that he had already paid Ria $286,000 and had asked her to get a divorce. Not until March of the following year, however, would the second Mrs. Gable make her move.

After she left for Las Vegas, Clark announced that "Mrs. Gable and I enjoyed a fine life together until the time arrived when further happiness was precluded. My wife has been extremely cooperative in all respects of the property settlement. Both of us were upset and shocked at the rumor that I intended to get the divorce. Never did such a thought enter my mind and the rumor was most offensive."

Undoubtedly, Gable will issue a similar statement after he and Sylvia Ashley finish their divorce fight. But these statements. on the basis of the record, have very little identity with the state of Gable's true feelings.

It is no secret, for example, that ever since last year he has considered Sylvia's alimony demands "grossly unfair."

In Nevada only recently, however, he told a reporter, "Sylvia is one of the finest women I've ever met. She's charming, intelligent, well-bred. I'm sorry it had to end this way. It's just that we believe in two different patterns of life. The reason I filed a complaint in Nevada is that when things are over, I like them to be over. No sense in dragging them on and on. If the California court says a Nevada divorce in my case is invalid, I believe in obeying the courts. We'll get the divorce in California. As for Sylvia, I repeat she's a fine woman and I wish her only the very best."

While Clark was speaking thusly in Nevada, he answered his wife's divorce action and demand for a large California property settlement with an affidavit which was filed in Santa Monica.

Gable said that his wife needed no financial settlement from him because she is worth approximately a million and a half dollars. He went into details pointing out that she owned a half interest in the $1,000,000 Rancho Zorro in San Diego County, jewelry appraised at $378,385 in March, 1950. More jewelry worth $90,000 she has brought from England. More than $12,000 in furs, $37,000 in securities, $25,000 in a bank account, a $50,000 beach home in Santa Monica, $15,000 in Solano Beach property, and $50,000 from a sale of films made by one of her ex-husbands, the late Douglas Fairbanks, Sr.

The contested divorce battle is scheduled to get under way in Santa Monica at the Superior Court some time in May of this year. It's possible that Lady Sylvia may agree to a small financial settlement and cancel out the court fracas, but under the circumstances, this isn't very probable. Sylvia feels she is entitled to be paid for the time she spent married to Gable and paid well.

In any event, she wants her divorce in the State of California which means that Clark Gable will not obtain his freedom until 1953.

What will the King do with it when he gets it? Will he marry Virginia Grey, the young actress who reminds so many people of the late Carole Lombard, will he play the field, or will he give up women and marriage for good?

A reporter who asked Clark if he was through with love got the following answer. "Love is something that stays with a person all through his life. A man just gets rid of it periodically. To live is to love. Life without loving people is pretty worthless."

Despite the bitterness of his anticipated court battle with Lady Sylvia, he still retains the famous Gable sense of humor. He frequently wonders out loud how he ever managed to get himself "hooked again" and he vows that many a moon will pass before he slips another ring on the second finger of some woman's left hand.

Of Gable's four marriages, three have been to elderly, matronly, and worldly women from whom he expected companionship, and a good deal of mothering.

The one young girl he married, Carole Lombard, turned out to be his most successful mate. If the King has learned his lesson, his next bride should be under 40. That's the only way he can break the jinx on his love life. THE END

Among friends at a small dinner party one evening, Jack Benny offered to read a particularly interesting letter from a G.I. he'd entertained on his recent tour of the Korean battle front. He settled a pair of glasses on his nose, started to read, then frowned. "Wrong ones," he muttered, and pulled another pair of specs from his pocket. "Wait a minute, Jack," said Van Johnson, "what do you need the first pair for?" "Those?" asked Benny. "Oh, they're the glasses I wear aound Tom Neal!"

Before he ever came to Hollywood Marlon Brando was a character, according to Broadway folk. Before he won his starring role in A Streetcar Named Desire he lived a nomadic existence in New York, flitting from one end of town to the other on a whim, and he seldom had a definite residence. To him, clothing was something to keep you warm or covered. As adornment, it was a theatrical prop. If he met a man or a family he liked, he would as often as not move in and stay awhile. And if he found himself in company he didn't like, he would rise, leave the room and the house without a word, and never come back.

HOLLYWOOD had been after Marlon Brando for a long time before Stanley Kramer finally signed him for The Men. Agents and producers would drop backstage at the theater and outline a project and Marlon would listen solemnly. But instead of giving an answer, if he didn't like the picture (he usually didn't), he would change the subject—so that it was impossible to negotiate with him. When he was asked about the Kramer movie, he listened politely and said he would do it. And he wouldn't talk about it any more except to discuss the starting date.

Kramer is a great believer in preparation for a movie, but Marlon stunned him with his ideas on the same subject. Many people thought it was a publicity stunt, but it wasn't. Marlon asked if he had time to study the paraplegics (he was to play one) before shooting started. Kramer said yes, so Marlon walked out of the office, stating he would be back on the day rehearsals were to start. A day or so later, the producer was astonished to learn that Marlon had checked into the Veterans' Hospital in Van Nuys and was living with the patients. During his stay there, he refused to move any more than a paraplegic could.

Most of the stories that have been told about Marlon Brando have been humorous, mainly because they involve erratic behavior. But the humor was always unintended on Marlon's part. It is doubtful that he has ever deliberately attempted a practical joke for the purpose of publicity. But when the funny side of one of his escapades has been explained to Brando, he has laughed heartily, as though he were hearing about the incident for the first time—and it involved someone else.

Marlon was born. That is generally all the information an interviewer lucky enough to get hold of him can verify. He has said he was born in Siam, where his father was a wealthy French planter, and it has been printed and believed. Actually, he was born in Libertyville, Illinois. His education was a messy matter because Marlon never liked to have others select the nature, time or place of his studies. After stumbling through grade school, he was tossed out of a couple of high schools before he decided to do away with formal education forever. Because he was a husky lad, proud of his physique, he set out to become a ditch digger and work the livelong day in the open air.

But his father had different notions. He offered to stake Marlon to any kind of specialized education he chose. After giving it a bit of thought—and no doubt being influenced by one of his sisters who was stage-struck—Marlon chose acting. He was promptly shipped off to New York to study dramatics under the aegis of Stella Adler.

Although Marlon Brando contends that acting is a craft that must be studied diligently and long, it must be conceded that he had a rare talent. Almost from his first appearance in summer stock, he was in demand by producers. If Streetcar hadn't come along to make him a star, another play would have. And if The Men hadn't made him a star in pictures, some other film would have.

Upon his arrival in Hollywood, Marlon became a property of MCA, the most plush management agency in town. Marlon has never been in their offices, but the company assigned a young man named Jay Cantor to "service" him. Cantor looked up Brando and was horrified to learn that he had no address. He slept wherever nightfall came upon him, although he did make some attempt to get to his aunt's house in Eagle Rock, California—a good 30 miles from the studio—once a week or so.

Because MCA didn't want it to get around that its hottest property was a waif, the agency promptly rented a house and moved Cantor and another young agent into the place. This was to give Brando a definite place of abode and to keep the agency informed to some extent as to Marlon's whereabouts.

Young Cantor found himself performing rather odd services for Marlon. There was the time, for instance, when the studio called and said Brando had lost his shoes. Jay got on the job and learned that Marlon had decided to go barefoot for awhile and couldn't remember where he had put his shoes. Jay suggested that they buy him another pair, but Marlon insisted that that would be a waste since the missing shoes were still in pretty good shape and he didn't mind going barefoot until they showed up. Finally, he agreed to borrow a pair until he found his own.

While studio publicity people apparently had a wonderful source of live copy in Brando, they also had their headaches with him. When they suggested that he take an actress out, Marlon looked at her picture and said no. When they suggested that romance made good column items and asked him who he was going out with, Marlon gave them the name of a girl he'd dated the night before. Asked for details, he said he'd seen her on the street, liked her and walked up and asked for a date. She turned out to be a waitress in a downtown hash house. That made no difference to Marlon. He liked her.

PLANNED interviews with Marlon Brando are impossible. Once a Warner Brothers press agent tried to sneak one over. He got Brando and a magazine writer together. Things went fine, except that Marlon refused to talk in anything but French—and neither the press agent nor the reporter understood the language.

On the other hand, Marlon can be as cooperative as anyone. This writer made an appointment to see him for this article. The date was set for three o'clock at Warner Brothers. I was there and so was Brando, but he had forgotten that he also made an appointment with a number of other people. In a bit of a huff, I said I was leaving and told Marlon to call me when he felt he could spare the time. He did, the next day, and instead of giving a few minutes as he usually does, he came to my house, spent a good eight hours, took a bath, borrowed some clean clothes, stayed for dinner and hated to leave.

When he returned to New York after making The Men one of the studio press agents called him and asked him to look in on his daughter, who had gone to New York for a try at the stage. Marlon called the young lady and suggested they get together for supper about 11 that night. The girl was somewhat confused about the late hour, but she agreed.

Marlon was on time. He was wearing an old pair of blue jeans, a T-shirt, a casual sweater and a stocking cap. The girl was dressed for dinner. Marlon took her down to the street and to a motorcycle parked at the curb. Without apology, he helped her aboard the back seat and started off in a roar of exhaust noises. It began to rain, but Marlon insisted he show her New York so they scooted around town for a couple of hours. Then Marlon took her into Central Park, lifted a bag of sandwiches from a pouch on his bike and escorted her to a dry spot under a tree, where they dined. The girl never quite got over the experience, but Marlon honestly thought he had shown her a swell time—and had done a favor for her dad.

Much has been printed about Marlon Brando's clothes. Most of it has been true, but his apparent hatred for anything resembling normal attire is not a gimmick. It is truly an eccentricity. This writer once saw him wearing a blue suit, and asked him who got him into a store long enough to buy one.

"I bought this from my agent," he said.

The fact that his agent was 40 pounds lighter, several inches shorter and of an entirely different build didn't matter. Marlon wore the suit without alterations and considered his wearing it at all a concession to society.

On the Aaron Slick from Punkin Creek set, Martha Stewart was discussing a certain well-known Hollywood actor and playboy, who gives every girl the once-over. "Yeah," said Martha, "he takes 'em out once and it's all over."

Living quarters have always been something of a problem to Marlon in New York. Landlords don't care to rent to him because of his passion for playing Bongo drums at all hours of the night. He once inserted an ad in the Saturday Review of Literature asking for an apartment, which read: "Wanted: an apartment—any old thing." A girl who dated Marlon one night tells of his Bongo drums routine. He sits his girl on a chair, gets the drums out, turns off the lights and in a tiny flicker of a candle beats the skins into the wee small hours of the morning. When the evening is over, he considers he has been an entirely considerate and entertaining host.

There are a hundred other tales of Marlon Brando's eccentricities, but all they do is confuse the portrait of the man because they are not understood. Within himself Marlon Brando is not an unusual person at all. He lives by a strict code, which forbids lying and cheating. He either likes or dislikes a person, seldom either violently. He has been known to give his overcoat on a bitter cold day to a stranger without one—and to go the rest of the winter coatless because he never got around to buying another.

The elaborate accommodations generally prepared for a star on location are wasted on him. During the filming of Zapata at Arizona, Marlon slept on the ground most of the time and ate with the grips.

With the exception of a young comedian named Wally Cox, Marlon Brando has no intimates. He has a tremendous liking and respect for Elia Kazan, but Cox is his only pal. They share an apartment in New York, but that is just the starting point from which to go places. His other friends are numerous but not fully accepted. Marlon drops in on them unexpectedly at any hour of the day or night and will stay, without invitation, for an hour, a day, or a month, depending on his enjoyment.

In the matter of money, Marlon Brando is entirely without responsibility. His income is huge, but he never sees it. The checks are sent to his father who invests the money in a cattle ranch which Marlon has never seen. The boy is given $150 a week on which to live—and he generally spends it within an hour or so after he has received it. From that point until he gets his next check, he puts the bite on anyone he meets. This is not due to a chiseling nature, but to the fact that money means absolutely nothing to him—and he thinks everyone else feels the same.

MARLON BRANDO is an avid student of everything. His main interest is the theater—at the moment—but he studies everything that momentarily appeals to him from tinsmithing to psychology. He is a good talker, but rarely proves it. And when he is in a conversation and a word is used that is unfamiliar to him, he promptly asks the full and definite meaning. If it can't be given, he gets a dictionary and looks it up. When he reads he becomes so absorbed in the material that a gun could be fired in the same room and he probably wouldn't hear it.

Although he is the epitome of male animalism on the screen he is entirely opposite in person. He has the physique you see in pictures, but the camera does something to his face to make it hard. Actually, his face is small, his features sensitive and his voice low and reserved in tone. His tremendous shyness is evident in his off-screen manner. He is quick to laugh heartily and quick to cry.

His appetites are as healthy as his oddities. During dinner at my house he took one look at a plate of fried chicken and, although there were four of us at the table, proceeded to polish it off as though it were his alone. He ate with such relish that the rest of us sat and watched fascinated, not daring to have another piece for fear we'd break the spell of his enjoyment. If he feels like taking a bit of exercise, he might hop out of his clothes, into a pair of bathing trunks and run through the city or countryside for 10 miles. If he falls temporarily in love with a craft, he will devote his every waking hour to it. And when he meets a girl he really likes, he will never leave her side until driven away.

It is the carefully considered opinion of professionals in Hollywood that Marlon Brando is the finest, most vital actor to come to films in many years. When A Streetcar Named Desire was premiered, most of the stars requesting tickets had seen the picture once or twice before, but wanted to see Brando act again. His work is, according to the experts, inspired and technically flawless—an unusual situation, indeed.

He will be back in Hollywood again to make more pictures, but until then he will be remembered well for his last act here. Walking into the ticket office of the Los Angeles airport, carrying a pet (which happened to be a raccoon) in his arms, he asked for two tickets. The clerk pointed to the pet and asked what it was.

"He is a friend of mine," said Marlon. "I want one of the tickets for him."

The clerk said the line didn't carry animals, and for an hour, Marlon stood there, holding up the line, while he attempted, with all the logic at his command, to convince the salesman that the raccoon was actually human. He did it, but the brass of the line said nix—so Marlon took the train.

You can take Marlon Brando or leave him. Just don't sell him short. There is no subterfuge in him and he does not try to be a character. He just is one. Period.

On moving day, it looked as though everybody the Steffans had ever known had enlisted to help. Like many young folks they did the moving themselves, and although they had bought a lot of furniture from the Jacobs, they still had many things to bring over from their old apartment. Cars went in and out of the driveway all day long, and while Geary helped unload the heavy pieces, Jane directed the pieces to different rooms.

Then the neighborhood waited for the housewarming that was sure to follow. Probably they did have one, but nobody heard it. The Steffans' parties are simple affairs, small dinner parties or gatherings in the front room with the shades drawn.

I can truthfully say that I go through life trying my best not to hurt anyone. That includes myself.
Lana Turner

The first few weeks in the house, Jane and Geary were in a fever of activity. They both appeared in the garden bright and early, armed with all sorts of garden tools and flat boxes of cuttings. That went on for quite a while and then they gave up the battle of the weeds and hired a gardener. Geary showed up one Sunday morning, lugging a brush and a bucket of paint and started on the picket fence that lines the front of their property. At noon Janie whistled him in for lunch, and that was the end of Geary's noble gesture.

They've had a big to-do with that fence. There'd never been a gate to the driveway, but it became necessary when Paper began wandering all over the county. The Steffans found an old gate in the back yard and planned to attach it to the fence, but some Sunday friends got at it first with blue and red paint. One picket stayed white, the next was painted red, the next blue, and the name of either Jane or Geary was written on each in contrasting color. It was promptly hitched to the fence, but was too short for a full gate, and too long to allow a big car to pass into the driveway. As a result, whenever a big car made the turn from our narrow street, a fender would remove one more picket.

"We've just got to do something about that fence," Jane kept telling us. But then the Steffans are busy people, and there isn't much time for that sort of thing. The neighbors have one complaint about Jane when she is home. She doesn't sing often enough. It's wonderful to hear her trilling up and down scales, and even her practicing sounds lovely. The minute she starts, half the windows in the neighborhood are thrown open. I remember one of the rare days when she sang, a couple of high school boys were working on our front lawn, and when they'd finished the job, they asked if they could sit on the front steps and just listen.

We've had a problem with visiting relatives in the neighborhood, for when they find out that Jane Powell lives in the same block they're always trying to see her. They spend their time at front windows, peeking out of the curtains, and are all for going over and asking for autographs, but we've managed to restrain them. The studios, though, want their stars to receive strangers with every hospitality, and I recall that the night Jane left on her concert tour last fall, a fan stopped at the house and stood talking with her a half hour, despite the fact that Jane was in a turmoil trying to pack and catch a plane.

That was the night they forgot the tickets. Their maid Gladys, a wonderful woman who takes complete charge of the house and the baby, says "I have to watch them both like they're babies themselves. I knew they'd forget those tickets. I kept telling them to be sure and remember, and Mr. Steffan just smiled at me as though I was worrying without cause. But sure enough, 10 minutes after they left I found the tickets—on the piano, of all places—and right away I phoned Mrs. Steffan's father. Well, he came over and got them and after he'd left for the airport, Mr. Steffan steamed up to the house, all in a lather. When he found out I'd sent them on with Mr. Burce, he just grinned and told me I was worth a million dollars."

You can tell Gladys thinks the world of "her" family, and the baby in particular. I suppose she feels she'll burst if she doesn't brag about them, and pours all her superlatives into the ears of another maid in the neighborhood, a woman named Mary. The two get together often, but whatever is said between them stays strictly that way, and Mary buttons up like a clam if anyone asks her anything at all about the Steffan family.

She forgot herself just once—the Saturday afternoon Geary drove Jane to the hospital. It was done quietly. He drove the car up to the front door and helped her in, and then headed quietly up the street. Lots of us saw them and waved, not knowing the reason for the trip. Two minutes later it was common knowledge, because once Mary had the news from an excited Gladys, she threw caution to the winds and spread the tidings like a public address system.

I GUESS most people in the neighborhood made up their minds not to throw themselves at the Steffans, but to let the newcomers start the conversation. We're all, I think, overly-conscious of the fact that movie people have trouble keeping their privacy. So it happened that the first time I saw them, I was possibly a bit rude. I was in the back yard, my hair up in curlers and a disreputable old sweater thrown over my shoulders, when I noticed Jane and Geary in their own garden. I ducked out of sight immediately, thinking they wouldn't want to recognize me that way, but I realized later that they had wanted to open a conversation that day.

Geary, incidentally, is probably the friendliest young man I have ever known. It isn't easy for a young man who has just begun a career in insurance to marry a glamorous established actress, but Geary seems to do quite well in the situation. When Janie has been tired from overwork and climbed on her high horse, her husband has been known to dampen her quite effectively. Well, now," he says, "aren't you the movie star!" And Mrs. Steffan bounces right back to earth.

After a concert which Ezio Pinza, the famous basso, sang in St. Joseph, Mo., a woman came gushing up to him and proudly announced to him: "Mr. Pinza, I certainly enjoyed your singing. Why, I stood through the entire concert!"

"I know how you feel. So did I," snapped Pinza. H. W. Kellick

Their son, of course, has made it even more perfect. From the beginning they were both tremendously excited about the prospect of having a baby. They took long walks every evening after dinner, stopping to chat with the neighbors. "We want six children, don't we, dear?" Jane used to say. And when Geary would look dubious, Jane would laugh and say, "Well—four, anyway." She used to sit by the side of the pool, her lap filled with yarn, knitting away on tiny things for the baby. As a matter of fact, she swam every day, at her doctor's suggestion, a thing which frightened all the older women in the neighborhood. We didn't know about it until the day one of our dogs ran into the Steffans' yard and got into a fight with Paper. The owner of the intruding dog went in to get him and found Jane in the pool, terrified of the snarling animals.

"Would you like me to phone somebody to separate them?" asked the woman.

"Oh, please!" Jane said. "I'd appreciate it—I'm afraid they'll knock me down if I get out of the pool, and I've already had my swim."

The neighbor stared at her in disbelief. "You mean you swim?"

Janie smiled. "Of course. It's good for me."

"Well, I never!" said the neighbor, and worriedly reported it to the rest of us.

After the baby was born Geary had a new air of authority. "It's a boy!" he announced proudly to everyone. But his enthusiasm didn't match Janie's when she came home. "I can't wait until we have another one," she said.

We've all seen the baby since that time, of course, and he's a handsome little fellow. Jane grows embarrassed when we ladle out compliments, but you can tell she's pleased. I guess it's a good thing she was given all of those seven showers, because every single garment she made with her own hands turned out to be too small by the time she tried them on. "I'll know better with the next one," she says. "I'll begin using them as soon as the baby's home from the hospital."

When Geary Steffan III was about two months old, Jane went east on a concert tour and took the baby with her. "They grow so fast at this time," she said, "and I don't want to miss a day of him. Besides, he recognizes me now, and he might forget me if I was away from him for any length of time."

Geary planned to meet her back East when the tour was finished and escort her around Manhattan on a fling, and Jane was thrilled. "I've only been in New York to work," she told me, "and this will be the first real fun I've had there."

She told us their friends were free to use the pool while they were away, and knowing the Steffan friends are legion we all anticipated many noisy swimming parties. But we were wrong once more. Not a soul showed up on two of the Sundays, and the rest saw only three or four couples spending a quiet afternoon around the pool.

I guess you could sum it up by saying that no one could ask for better neighbors. They're friendly but not overpowering, they have mannerly and considerate friends, and they have a baby that never cries—or at least we can't hear him if he does. They're quiet, but at the same time we're all provided with a show that goes on almost perpetually—handsome young couples, sleek Cadillacs, beautiful clothes, and what's more important, I suppose, the sight of a boy and girl who are very much in love. THE END what's wrong with the grangers?

Mr. Granger, wanting to give his bride the luxurious home every girl dreams of, fell into that old Hollywood trap of shooting the future bankroll on a present palace. Stewart has $150,000, plus a new $15,000 playroom sunk, and I use the word deliberately, into the three-level Bel Air home, opposite the English villa owned, and I use that word deliberately too—by Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond. It is reported that MGM loaned Stewart the big down payment, to be repaid out of his salary over a period of five years. There isn't much salary left after taxes, agents' fees and down payment repayment.

So as I write this story, one year (they married December 20th) after Mr. Granger carried his bride over the threshold of the brave beautiful new home, they are trying desperately to sell the financial white elephant, for something more in keeping with the actual size of their combined motion picture incomes and pocketbooks.

"We never could afford the furniture for the five bedrooms, the enormous living room, dining room, library, den and guest rooms. We literally camp out in two rooms. What with the swimming pool and the grounds and the problem of getting help, we just don't want a big home," Jean says ruefully.

That, plus the error of attempting to keep up with the Colman, Cooper and William Powell era of stars who made their money when taxes were low, sent Jean scurrying around on her off days from Androcles And The Lion to find a cottage for two where they can bill and coo, she hopes, without the droppers-in who flock to the swimming pools of their supposedly wealthy friends on Sunday afternoons.

"They don't only come to swim and play," complains Jean bitterly, "but they expect to be fed and supplied with drinks. We found a cute little two-bedroom house in Benedict Canyon, we were going to buy it over the weekend, but it was gone. When I finish Androcles And The Lion, I'm going on a small house hunt until Jimmy completes Scaramouche. Then we go to Acapulco for a holiday, and to New York, where we'll stay with Glynis Johns. I hope the big house will be sold while we're away."

I hope so too. Because right from the start, the mansion was unlucky for them. When I saw them that day in the drug store, they seemed a million miles away from the honeymooning couple they were supposed to be. In addition to the sniffles, Jean had a headache. And the jollity of best man Michael Wilding, who was their house guest, failed conspicuously as an aspirin.

"Our pots and pans and linens which were supposed to arrive from England, didn't," Stewart told me while Jean leaned her head wearily on the counter. "So we can't cook a thing and have to sleep on beds without sheets, and no towels to dry our hands." Their honeymoon breakfast was a sandwich over the cold counter!

I remember Jean's delight when Howard Hughes bought her contract, which had 18 months to go, from the British producers who 'owned' her. "It means I can work in Hollywood and I won't be parted from Jimmy," Jean sighed ecstatically. The Devil who hates Cupid, must have laughed aloud at that point, because right away, Granger was sent to Idaho and Oregon to shoot scenes for The Wild North Country, then to Italy and Africa for The Light Touch, then to San Francisco for Scaramouche. And for all his loving wife saw of him, she might just as well have been back in England working for Rank.

To make matters much worse, she sat around for nine months moping at home, and feeling terribly homesick for England where she was rated a big star, while her Androcles picture waited and waited to start production. "I used to be so lonely in that big house while Jimmy was away," she said. I'm sure there would be no problem worth reporting today, if Jean had been able to start work immediately after the marriage, as her husband did. The wait nibbled huge chunks from her self-confidence, which left her wide open for Granger's constant criticism.

I want to make it clear that Stewart is fundamentally a kind man, and I repeat, he is in love with his wife. I believe this is the reason for his critical attitude toward her. It's like a mother wanting her Johnny to look his best when company comes. And, because she is over-anxious, little Johnny is a little stinker.

Jean is only 22, 17 years younger than her husband, but she is nobody's fool. She tries her darndest to live up to her husband's conception of what his wife should look like, sound like, and be like. But everything she does, he can do better. This is a fact. Even cooking. Jean makes no attempt at culinary perfection. But Stewart is a heck of a fine chef. And he tries, quite patiently, to teach Jean how—especially on weekends when the help is away.

Granger is a good athlete from way back. He swims like a fish. Jean just swims period. Jimmy has now tutored her past the breast stroke. He taught her how to drive a car. He taught her how to entertain. She is always the pupil; he is always the teacher. Jean even humbly admits she has no clothes sense, and meekly asks his advice on what to wear.

It isn't possible that one man can know so much and one attractive charming woman, so little. All Jean needs is more confidence. And I believe this will come when she makes more pictures and establishes herself with the American public. Her new RKO contract, which starts next June, calls for six pictures to be made within two years. She will be paid in American dollars, and she will co-star with her husband in at least two movies. The first, Young Bess, is a loan-out to Metro. They will be together 24 hours a day.

Will the perfect man retain his perfection with the proximity that has proved disastrous for other Hollywood couples? Look at these working teams that went awry—Ida Lupino-Collier Young, Deanna Durbin-Felix Jackson, Judy Garland-Vincent Minnelli.

I believe that being together will keep Jean and Stewart together. For the simple reason that they love each other. Stewart keeps an oil painting of Jean in his dressing room. She wears her wedding ring and diamond solitaire, even in scenes where she shouldn't. "I like looking at it," she explains. "I turn the diamond inside my palm, until I have to do a close-up, then I give it to my hairdresser to hold."

Always on the set with her is the miniature silver poodle that Jimmy gave her when she started Androcles. The pooch is called 'Young Bess.' And for her birthday, January 31st, Jimmy gifted her with a shiny Jaguar convertible, a little number that set him back another $5,400. Of course, he is teaching her how to drive it. She wrecked the first car, a Bristol convertible, that Jimmy gave her.

And this is what Jimmy says of the young wife he first dated when she was sweet 17. "She's the most completely unspoiled girl I've ever met. According to the press (and myself) she is considered one of the most beautiful girls in England. Also one of the most talented actresses, and she remained unspoiled through it all."

"I was always a fan of Jimmy's," Jean tells me. "I used to wait for him at premieres and openings and rush up to him, asking for his autograph. I think I was 14 the first time I met him, and I'll never forget the nice way he shook hands with me and signed my book—'To Jean with best wishes, Jimmy.'" Jean loves Jimmy so much, she wears his enormous dressing gown on the set between takes, to keep contact with him.

Now I think it's up to Mr. Granger to look at his mate and his marriage honestly and objectively. To ask himself, "Am I giving Jean a fair deal?" Because there is no trouble with the Grangers that a little normal understanding won't cure.

THE END

(Continued from page 33) He worried and worked, took any kind of employment, earned almost nothing and in six months landed stone broke on the outskirts of Pasadena, California, entrance to the promised land. The Model T leaned exhausted against the side of the road, with two flat tires, a ladder roped to its side and three hungry passengers (one of them very young) dolefully staring into the future.

Today, Alan Ladd lives in the splendor becoming a Grade A movie star, but his first days in California were anything but splendid. Jim Beaver got the car started, dug up a few dollars and moved the family into a tent at the rear of an auto court. Across the street was Southern California's noisiest auto speedway.

Life in a tent, Alan recalls, was often inconvenient. Needless to say, toilet facilities were not built in and bathing and other conveniences were located some distance away. Cooking, too, was a problem. In nice weather, Alan's mother would build a fire in a small wood stove in the open air and prepare dinners of sound proportions. When it rained, however, it was necessary to cook inside, and Alan's most vivid recollection of life under canvas was the haste with which his mother would prepare a meal, then grab the stove between two huge potholders and toss it outside so the fire wouldn't burn down the tent.

One day Jim Beaver came home and proudly showed a deed to a small plot of land in South Pasadena. The family loaded themselves and their possessions into the car and went to look at their land. It was just that—land. Sleeping in the car, they set about erecting a shelter. No doubt anticipating easy times the Beavers put up a garage first. But a slump in the painting business came along and they never got around to the main house. They moved into the garage.

It was at this time that Alan Ladd first came to know about motion picture studios

Jim went out into the new neighborhood looking for work. One day he wandered into Hollywood and learned that the movie studios hired painters. He got himself a job at a good wage, but the commuting distance proved too great for the little Ford and soon the family moved to Hollywood across the street from Paramount. It was real elegant living. The street was nice and to Alan's delight their home was right next to a fire station.

ALAN was beginning to grow up. He was a tough, wiry kid who loved to fight. If another boy was too big, Alan took him on anyway—and to make up for the difference in size, he'd perch atop a pal's shoulders and whale away at his opponent.

At night, after the studio workers had gone home, Alan would scale the fence and wander through the sets, dreaming of the magic that went on there. He walked the very streets he now drives over in the company's finest limousine, never imagining that one day he'd be the biggest money-making star in the history of that very company.

By the time Alan Ladd was 10 the depression hit California like a drought. Studio work, for his stepfather, was hard to get and couldn't be depended on to support the family. Everyone had to pitch in. Alan got up at four in the morning to clean and sweep out a confectionery store in the neighborhood for a dollar a week. The job was all right, but Alan's employer made his life miserable by trying to prove he was stealing candy.

Jim Beaver tried to find other employment and often had to supply his own equipment and materials on a job that paid him as little as three or four dollars. The three immigrants found the going pretty rough and were forced to move constantly because they got behind in the rent.

A windfall came to them one day when a man offered to buy the Beavers' lot and garage in South Pasadena. It gave Alan his first contact with big money.

Mrs. Beaver and Alan went to South Pasadena to close the sale and collect the money. This accomplished, she found herself frighteningly far from home with $1,500 cash in her purse. It terrified her and this feeling was picked up by Alan. All the way home on a street car, Mrs. Beaver was positive they were being followed and would shortly be robbed and murdered. When they got off the trolley, she hit upon an idea. She took Alan into a small waiting room and stuffed the bills into the pouched knees of his knickerbockers. Now the safety of the money rested with him—and he didn't like it.

It was a mile from the trolley stop to home and, upon the advice of his mother, Alan walked ahead, whistling and kicking at rocks like a small boy at play. And so they made it to safety, alive and unrobbed. To this day Alan Ladd doesn't like to carry money.

During the trying years of the depression Alan's mother faced most of the really bad problems for the three of them. It was she who calmed the landlords when they didn't have the rent, who cajoled more credit out of the grocer. "In those days," Alan said, "you could have shaken the whole valley and not found 15 cents, but Ma always found a way to keep going." Alan, always a civic-minded boy, volunteered one Christmas to help distribute food baskets to the poor—and found one basket addressed to his own house. He wept, but didn't take it home.

Alan Ladd became a bona-fide wage earner at an age when most kids are concerned only with play. He built up a regular route cutting lawns at a few pennies each. On week-ends he got his recreation at the Van Nuys public swimming pool—and in order to get in free, he raked and cleaned the pool.

His first steady job was as an apricot cutter in the Valley. His chore was to neatly remove the seed and split the fruit open. For this highly specialized work he was paid 15 cents a lug. Within two summers, Alan was promoted to carrying trays of cut apricots from one part of the plant to another. And eventually he was graduated to turning the drying fruit and then placing the meats in huge pans. He was fired because he was caught taking a nap on a blanket atop a pan of dried merchandise.

When he was 14 years old, Alan went to work for the Piggly-Wiggly chain of markets. He washed carrots, tomatoes, potatoes, etc., so they'd look good to the customers. Before closing time he carted and lugged boxes and crates until dark. He has the million-dollar muscles today to prove it.

"The only time I ever stole anything in my life," Alan told me, "was when I was working for Piggly-Wiggly. I had never tasted an avocado—and I couldn't understand why they should be so expensive—seven cents. So I stole one and took it in the back room and ate it. I still couldn't figure out why they were so expensive!"

When Alan was ready for high school, he was properly enrolled at Lankershim High and eventually became president of the student body.

Toward the end of his high school days Alan found the profession he thought he wanted to follow—the newspaper business. He met a man named Frank Hadlock who had started a throw-away paper called the Sun-Record and joined his staff. Alan quickly became invaluable to the paper. Being student body president, he knew everybody in town—and being a born organizer, he started balls rolling that Hadlock himself hadn't thought about.

Alan at first served in the double capacity of columnist of school activities and circulation boy. He soon became circulation manager and a very promising young journalist. He would sweat over his copy, the editor would read it, tear it up and throw it in the waste basket. This indicated to Alan that the man was interested in him and he worked like a fool to please him.

As circulation manager of the Sun-Record, Alan had his hands full. It was one of his duties to see that the 22,500 copies of the sheet got to the subscribers' front doors before they were out of bed one morning each week. Alan was horrified to learn that the distributors were picking up the sheets at the plant and burying all but a few hundred of them in vacant lots. So he had to turn detective and shadow his men throughout the night until the job was done.

Alan's next step forward on the Sun-Record came as the result of an accident. He was driving the advertising manager home one evening when a friend hailed him from another car. Alan hailed back, swerved and struck another car. His passenger hit the dashboard with such force that he broke his knee caps in 19 places. Alan Ladd became advertising manager.

But being a columnist and advertising manager at the same time soon became intolerable. Alan had to approach local merchants to buy space and nine times out of ten was obliged to put the name of the merchant's wife or kid in his column or get no ad. So he quit the paper that was paying him $35 a week and went to the Daily News in Los Angeles as a cub reporter at $12 a week. However, the family needed a more substantial income.

WHEN he left the Daily News, Alan decided to go into business for himself. He managed to borrow a few dollars and opened a small hamburger stand across from a swimming pool in North Hollywood. He knew nothing about cooking, but his mother came to work with him—and soon, Tiny's, as it was called, was a fairly flourishing business.

Jim, Alan and his mother were very happy with the new enterprise. Jim labored in the studios while Alan and his mother operated the stand. They worked hard, and, for almost the first time since they came to California, the family was on its feet and getting along fine.

Stardom in the movies was still a long way off for him, and it actually never even entered his mind. But he was a handsome lad and it was inevitable that a talent scout would one day find him. A well-dressed chap came to Tiny's one day and observed Alan carefully. When the cafe was empty, he spoke up.

"You're a fine-looking young fellow," he said. "You happy in this business?"

"Pretty happy," said Alan. "Why?"

"I got something maybe you'd like better," said the man and passed Alan a card. He was a talent scout, all right—for the National Cash Register Company. The result of this meeting was that Alan made an agreement to work days selling cash registers and nights in his hamburger stand.

The boss at National, as Alan remembers him, was a rather stuffy chap with a personal dislike for every member of his staff. He would stare stonily at the assembled salesmen each morning and begin his pep talk with something like: "Gentlemen of the Valley, we are not doing very well. . . ." After a time, Alan grew to hate the work, but he wanted the extra money for something very important. Ever since he had been wearing long pants he wanted to own a beige gabardine suit and a pair of brown suede shoes. He got them, but they were his undoing.

The day Alan showed up wearing this equipment, the Sales Manager cold-eyed him and when the meeting ended, he called Alan into a private conference.

"See here, young man," he said. "That is not proper dress for a representative of this company. Please don't wear those things again."

Alan promptly quit. It was a crazy business, he thought. And he still thinks the National Cash Register Company lost a darn good man.

Alan went back to his hamburger stand, but the taste of outside money was in his mouth. He wanted to keep the dollars rolling in. One of his customers was a grip at Warner Brothers. He knew that Alan was a diver, and he suggested that this talent could be put to good use in the studios. Alan didn't get it for a moment until the man explained that a grip worked on high parallels above the stage—and that the ability to cat walk at heights was a decided talent. Alan went to Warner Brothers and got a job.

"I'll never forget my first day in the movies," he told me. "I worked on Green Pastures. It was January, and in the early morning there was frost on everything. Twelve of us were 65 feet in the cold air 'boxing' the backing for the set. We had to pull on this big canvas cyclorama and when we had it up in the right position a guy yelled 'tie it off!' I didn't know what that meant, so I put a slip knot in my section—and it sagged. The boss called me down and fired me. I was pretty sore, because I had gone to J. C. Penney's and bought a pair of overalls, a hammer and a saw—and I was fired in the first 10 minutes. But when the fellow found out I was a diver, he hired me back."

Alan Ladd worked at Warners as a grip for eight months, and during that time he seldom stepped on the floor of the stages. From his high perch he learned the first things he now knows about making movies. It fascinated him, although he never really thought much about becoming an actor. Once he was talked into trying out with a small amateur dramatic group which was meeting nights at Universal, but he didn't last long. Carl Laemmle, the head of the studio at that time was an observer at one of the auditions and when Alan appeared, he turned to an assistant, and in a very loud voice cried:

"Can't hear the boy!"

So Alan was out.

But the bug had nibbled at him and all he needed was one more incident to spur him on. It came when, from atop his catwalk one day, he spotted a fellow he had met in the Universal auditions. The man was sitting in a chair, his head tilted back and his hat half across his face, sound asleep. With the exception of an hour for lunch, he reclined that way the entire day. The next morning he was back again, and the day after that—still sleeping.

At the end of the third day, Alan could control his curiosity no longer. He climbed down from his parallel and asked the chap what he was doing. The man explained he hadn't been called for a scene yet.

"How much are they paying you for this sleeping bit?" asked Alan.

"Fifty dollars a day," said the man.

"FIFTY DOLLARS A DAY!" Alan roared. "They only pay ME forty-two fifty for slaving up there all week! I'm switching rackets."

When Alan decided to become a movie actor he went about it scientifically. He got in touch with a former high school dramatics teacher and asked her if she thought he had a chance. She did—and suggested that he select a school and take some lessons. Alan searched very carefully, visited schools, looked at the ads in theatrical magazines and talked to anyone who would listen to him about the project. He finally decided on Ben Bard's, a new academy with a roster of 22 pupils. He sold his restaurant, counted his meager savings, and decided he'd give himself six months to get on a paying basis.

By the time that six months had ended, Alan Ladd's life had changed consider-

I SAW IT HAPPEN

One day at Cartier's in New York, where I was employed, a very lovely woman and her escort who had been shopping there started to leave. She stopped suddenly and looked at a plaque attached to the back of a chair. It stated that the Queen of Romania had once sat there during a visit to the United States.

The stunning woman turned and looked at me, then said with very naïve interest, "You know, I've always wanted to know who sat in that chair, but never read the plaque before!"

ably. It had been six months of struggle and sorrow. Within a matter of weeks both Jim Beaver and his mother fell ill and died. His mother had been delighted that Alan had chosen acting as a profession and she envisioned big things for him. Alan vowed then that no matter how long it took or how hard the road he would be an actor and that the hardships the three of them had withstood together would pay off. He worked night and day, with little but auditions and rejections to show for his efforts, but he kept on going, poorer than he'd ever been before with Hunger and Disappointment as his constant companions. But he became an actor—a working actor.

The road to eventual stardom for Alan Ladd was, contrary to what has been printed, a difficult one. It has been said that he slipped into a picture called Paper Bullets, the first movie venture of the fabulous King Brothers, was discovered by a major studio and was on his way. Actually, he played 40 bits and 15 featured roles before Paper Bullets. There were six other roles that could loosely be called leads.

If he hadn't met Sue Carol, once a screen star herself and then an actors' agent, he might never have been a star. Alan had decided that radio was his forte (after all, it was acting) and was picking up a miserable living playing odd bits. Sue heard him one night, liked his voice and delivery and asked him to drop in to the office. Alan was willing to drop in on anybody who might help him, so he went to Sue's office late one afternoon.

It wasn't love at first sight, but it was close. As Sue tells it, this handsome thing in a long trench coat walked into the room and she was stunned. She immediately decided he was a magnificent picture type. Alan, who had tried it, didn't agree with her. He had a number of valid reasons.

In the first place, blond men weren't leading men, according to Alan. He wasn't photogenic; he had been told not to smile because he looked awful; and his experiences in movie studios had taught him that it was a waste of time to fight precedent. Sue said she'd fight anyway.

A CAMPAIGN began to get Alan Ladd a number one spot in a good picture. Sue decided to devote most of her time to this and to let the employees in her office take care of the rest of the clients. Alan's top salary had been $150 a week, for Paper Bullets. Sue took him to Paramount and sold him for $250 a week for two weeks' work in Rulers Of The Sea. Alan's role called for him to be in the opening and final shots. The company moved to Catalina Island and Alan loafed around 11 weeks before they finally got to him. It was a windfall. It was money in the bank, but better still, the three months on the island, resting and eating his head off fattened him up and improved his already—as far as Sue was concerned—splendid appearance.

A short time later an independent company was casting an epic called Hitler—The Beast Of Berlin. Sue went to the producers, told them Alan had just finished 11 weeks at Paramount, a major studio, and they were impressed enough to employ Alan as the star. The entire shooting schedule was only five days, but it was a step forward. The film was made on such a shoe string, that, although Alan was the star, an assistant director made him double as a prison inmate, sweeping out a courtyard. When the film was completed, it was discovered that Alan, who had been killed three quarters of the way through the movie, was easily recognizable in the sweeping bit toward the end. However, by that time the producers had run out of

A modern woman doesn't have to be told how important the practice of complete hygiene (including internal feminine cleanliness) is to health, married happiness and after her periods. She also knows that even the most refined woman must constantly guard against an odor—far graver than bad breath or body odor. And a modern woman knows she should always use ZONITE in her douche because no other type liquid antiseptic-germicide of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues.

Wise Women No Longer Use Old-Fashioned Methods

A well-informed woman would no longer even think of relying on old-fashioned ineffective mixtures which are nothing more than 'kitchen makeshifts.' On the other hand she understands the serious dangers of using harmful poisons. That's why ZONITE is such a blessing for womankind!

Yet, despite its great germ-killing power, ZONITE is ABSOLUTELY SAFE to the most delicate tissues. It is positively non-poisonous, non-irritating—the first antiseptic-germicide in the world so powerfully effective yet harmless for a woman to use.

ZONITE's Miracle-action

ZONITE dissolves and removes odor-causing waste substances. It helps guard against infection and kills every germ it touches. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, but you can BE SURE ZONITE immediately kills every reachable germ and keeps them from multiplying. You can depend on ZONITE!

money and couldn't reshoot—so it was left in.

Due to Sue's energy and craftiness, Alan moved ahead until he had made 62 pictures—and still seemed destined for comparative anonymity. He was, however, considered a competent actor and work came easier. He played such things as "Tennis anyone?" Englishmen and fine young American youths. Never a heavy.

During these trying times Alan stuck it out only because Sue believed in him. He was a lonely fellow and when he wasn't working he would drive Sue about on her chores. It was during this time that they fell in love. They developed the wonderful rapport that stands them in such good stead in their marriage today. If Sue got to a point in an interview where she would have to talk about Alan in glowing terms, he sensed it and casually excused himself from the room. They often laughed about this afterwards.

One day the big chance came. RKO was casting a picture called Joan Of Paris. Alan got the role of a soldier who died in dramatic close-ups. He did it so well, he drew raves from the critics and the town. This was the turning of the tide.

For some time previous to this, Paramount had toyed with the idea of putting him under contract. Sue, however, no matter how badly Alan needed the money, kept turning the proposition down, promising that she would talk contract any time Alan was given a part that would start him off properly.

The break came while he was still at RKO. Director Frank Tuttle was preparing a picture called This Gun For Hire in which there was a role for a gun-crazy killer. Sue looked at the script and suggested Alan. She brought him to the studio, but Tuttle took a look at him and said he wasn't the type. However, a test was agreed upon. Alan's hair was dyed black—and he played the part for the executives.

This was probably Hollywood's most famous experiment in what is called off-casting. The bosses looked at the test, saw this youthful, handsome boy play the ruthless killer Raven and, in the parlance of the movies, flipped. Buddy de Sylva, at that time head of the studio, said, "That's the boy!" Alan was in, except for the matter of negotiating a contract.

That night Alan and Sue talked the thing over very carefully. RKO was offering a contract at $400 a week. Paramount was willing to take a chance, but wouldn't pay more than $300. They looked at the script of Gun again—and decided to take the Paramount offer. When the picture was finished and previewed, Alan came across like nothing the executives had seen before. And the rest is movie history. He was a star. And he has been a star—a big star—ever since.

THE Ladds' home life is like that of any substantial, close-knit, well-to-do family in the country. There is Alan, Sue, Carol Lee, 18, daughter of Sue by a former marriage; Laddie, 15, Alan's son by a former marriage; Alana, an eight-year-old daughter who is the terror of the household and David, a four-year-old, who is the spit'n image of his dad.

The Ladds look upon movie stardom as a business. Alan and Sue carefully study each new project, whether it be a movie, a publicity campaign, a magazine story or any other facet of the business, as though it were their first one. And they keep working to keep Alan at the top of his profession.

Sue, married almost 10 years now, remains in the background a good deal, but she is a definite consultant member of the company. There has been talk that Sue is the boss. This is not true. One has only to see Alan Ladd in his home to know who wears the pants—and there is no doubt about it. He hates to talk on the telephone, so Sue takes most of the calls—which is what gave rise to the tales.

When they are on the road, Sue plays the wife and nothing more. She is unknown to the fans. For instance there was a time when Alan was besieged by thousands of scrambling fans in an eastern city. Sue became separated from him. She asked a policeman for help, saying she wanted to get into Alan's car.

"Look, lady," said the cop, not knowing who she was, "There are about a thousand women here who want to get into that car. You'll have to move on."

Sue did—down the street a couple of blocks, and Alan had to drive down there to pick her up.

The movie fan to Alan Ladd is supreme. Once when he was being stormed by autograph hunters a policeman complained that the kids were stepping on his corns. Alan told him to get behind him—and he buffeted a way to the car and drove off with a grateful officer waving goodbye. The fans wouldn't step on Alan.

At this writing Alan's exclusive contract at Paramount is about ended. He has the unique record in the film industry of never having made a picture that has lost money. That makes him the best bet any producer can buy—and certifies him as Hollywood's number one star.

This writer sat in his house one night when Alan's agent came in with the most fabulous contract ever drawn up for a star. It was with Warner Brothers and called for one picture a year for ten years, without options. The money is $150,000 per picture with 10% of the gross of the pictures—that means 10 cents from every dollar paid at the box-offices—and it involves millions of dollars for Alan's services. The agent sat on the arm of a chair and told Alan the details. Alan said okay.

The agent went to the telephone and called Jack Warner, head of the studio. He informed Warner that the deal was agreeable. Then he handed the phone to Alan.

"Well, we're all set, Mr. Warner," Alan said. "It will be kind of nice going back to work for you."

"Did you ever work for us before?" Warner asked in surprise.

"I sure did," said Alan. "You paid me forty-two fifty a week. And I was the best grip you had on the lot."

He grinned happily at the joke and at what had happened and he hung up the phone.

That isn't the end of his story, but you know the rest. With the making of This Gun For Hire he was launched on his fabulous career.

You know now that Alan Ladd wasn't born with a gold Oscar in his mouth nor the open road to success stretching easily before him. His road to his position today was filled with heartbreak, desire, even hunger. He was a winner because he was a small boy who swept out a candy store for a dollar a week; because he was a young man willing to work nights learning the newspaper business. He is a star today, maybe, because he placed the right to wear a beige gabardine suit and brown suede shoes above a steady job as a cash register salesman.

But if Alan could tell you his honest opinion, without it being prejudiced by other things, I think he would say he is what he is today because he wanted to make the journey of Jim Beaver and his beloved mother to the California land a worthy one. THE END

Among these intimates was a song writer, a good one, by the name of Hugh Martin. He had written, among other things, "The Trolley Song" for Judy's hit Meet Me In St. Louis. There was Chuck Walters, a mere lad but already conceded to be top talent in the directing of musical pictures. There was Roger Edens, a production assistant and a brilliant arranger of special material. And there were a few others, costumers, technicians and just plain hard workers who became Judy's secret gang. They helped her over the rough spots—and they promised that if they were ever needed for a big project they'd be ready.

The night that Judy Garland gashed her throat in a fit of despondency was the pay-off between her and Hollywood. Dropped from the contract list, the word got out that she was too unreliable to be employed by anyone—and Judy, in a torment of shame and loss of confidence in herself, ran away from Hollywood, her friends and even her gang.

It was an accepted fact after that night that Judy Garland was through as an entertainer. It was accepted in the studios and by the fans who had been hers since she was a kid. It was a hard pill to swallow for the fans, but they faced the inevitable They didn't stop loving her, but they wept for her instead of cheering her on or comforting her. The newspapers and the magazines printed tales of her loss of position—and each carried a strong melancholy message of regret. The kid was washed up, dead in show business, and everyone went to the funeral.

The turn of the tide in Judy Garland's life, both professional and personal, came when she met a young man by the name of Sidney Luft. Although a lot has been written about him, little has been definitive. He is known as Judy's "manager" or "boy friend" or both. Beyond that, all that is known is that he, too, got into a jam with Hollywood and the police—so maybe they had something in common.

Actually, Sid Luft is very much like Judy Garland and at the time of their meeting they had a good deal in common. In a way, their lives had run almost parallel for a number of years. Judy had been a star in the movies—Luft had been a brilliant flyer, a top test pilot for a major aviation manufacturer during the war. Judy slipped in the regard of her employers and couldn't take it—and so did Luft. Judy was married and unhappy—so was Luft. Judy began to drown her sorrows in gay parties and hated it—so did Luft. They were birds of a feather. Take a look at the pictures taken of them when they first met. They wear the same harassed expressions. They were in the same fix.

They met at a party, a small intimate gathering held in Hollywood. Newly-separated, Judy was alone—so was Sid. Somebody came by and said:

"You two know each other? Judy Garland—Sid Luft. Sid—Judy."

They nodded, neither wanted to meet anyone that night. But a little later on they fell into a conversation. They began to enjoy it, so they forgot about the other people there. Later on Sid took Judy home and they talked for hours. Sid is an excellent conversationalist, a real wit, and Judy enjoyed him so much she laughed a lot that night and morning and Sid enjoyed hearing her laugh. They have seldom been away from one another since that night.

It is an admitted romance now between Sid and Judy but it wasn't at first. It was a genuine friendship between two lonely, unhappy people. Judy lived in a hotel in Beverly Hills, so they had to eat out most of the time. They went to the usual gay spots for awhile, but they attracted too much attention from the gossip columnists, so they began to frequent the smaller, cozier spots. Maybe that is where love bloomed, in the intimacy of tiny, candle-lit cafe booths, where voices are low against a background of juke box love songs.

The people who know the inside of Judy Garland's comeback triumph will tell you that it was hatched at those meetings. When Judy and Sid knew they were in love they began to plan for the days ahead. Sid had been producing pictures on a minor scale and he wasn't happy at it. He had a good knowledge of show business and some good ideas. He suggested that Judy stop mooning over a lost film career and get back on the stage and convince herself of her capacity for work and her own talent. Judy wasn't sure. She was terrified at the thought of doing a show in Hollywood—and even though she had been offered the Mary Martin role in South Pacific in New York, she feared she wouldn't make good before a Gotham audience.

"Look," said Sid, "that's all nonsense. But if you want to prove it to yourself, let's make it Europe. You can name your own figure in London—and if you make good there, you can come back and do the same in New York. Give it a try."

Judy took his hand and said she'd try.

In the summer of 1951, Judy Garland went to London and Sid followed shortly after. She opened as a singing single at the Palladium, and the critics raved. Judy was a smash—the English offered to keep her over there if we didn't want her. Then, for three months, Judy traveled the British Isles singing in theaters to capacity audiences. Some of the terror left her. She was seen on Scottish golf courses and at sports events. On the arm of Sid, she began going to parties again, big, social parties where a nervous girl would have been miserable, and she enjoyed herself.

But there was still America to face. The way to do it was a problem. Maybe a Broadway show. Maybe an independent picture, to be produced by Sid. Maybe on television. Judy and Sid decided to come back to Hollywood and plan from there. They were greeted in New York by a very enthusiastic press, and nearly every reporter commented on how happy Judy seemed. In Hollywood, Judy was feted like a conquerer. There was a round of festive events—and then the reality of the decision to be made. But Sid had taken care of that.

One day, a couple of weeks after they had been home, Sid picked Judy up in the car and started to drive toward Beverly Hills.

"Where are we going?" Judy asked.

"You'll see," said Sid.

He drove to the palatial offices of the William Morris Agency and led Judy directly to the private suite of Abe Lastfogel, Judy's long-time agent and true friend. They all sat down.

"What's this all about?" Judy asked.

"Tell her, Abe," said Sid.

"You're going to open on Broadway," Lastfogel said.

"On BROADWAY?" Judy cried. "In what show?"

"You're going to play the Palace," said Lastfogel.

"But the Palace is a movie house," said Judy. "They haven't had just live acts in there for years. And besides, who would back me?"

Lastfogel got up and paced. "A lot of people would," he said, "but I'm going to. I've got it all arranged. We'll rent the theater and put in two-a-day vaudeville. Just like it was 20 years ago."

"But if that's such a good idea," said Judy, "why hasn't someone done it before?"

"Because," said Lastfogel, "there hasn't been a star big enough to bring two-a-day back to Broadway. Now there is. Judy Garland."

Judy's eyes filled with tears of gratitude for the compliment and in appreciation of the love of these two men. But she had misgivings.

"Gee," she said, "I don't know if I can do it. It would have to be done better than any other show on the street. The people who could put on a show like that have all been gobbled up by the movies. I don't know anybody who could do things the way they'd have to be done."

"Sure you do," said Lastfogel. "And you can be very happy, Judy, because these people wouldn't take jobs like this for anyone but you. Roger Edens will arrange and write the special material."

Judy could only gasp.

"Chuck Walters will go back and direct the show," said Lastfogel.

Judy choked up again.

"And Hugh Martin will accompany you at the piano."

Judy didn't say a word. She just sat very quietly in the big leather chair and looked at the handkerchief she clutched in her hands—and she couldn't see it.

"That's my old gang," she whispered finally. "That's my old gang."

There was a great deal of artistry put into the creation of Judy Garland's first appearance on Broadway, but it didn't compare to the love that went into the show. Edens worked harder than he ever had before, preparing the lyrics and helping the arrangers with the score. Walters never seemed to be satisfied with the presentations and routining of the act; and Hugh Martin wanted to practice the songs until it wasn't possible to make them any better. Sid Luft and Lastfogel stood in the wings and watched and felt grateful to Judy's gang.

Then came opening night. On "The Street" it was the event of the season. A movie star was coming to Broadway, they'd see what she could do. Two-a-day was back. It couldn't be done. You couldn't buy a ticket, though. The people who remembered Judy in her films saw to that.

We know an actor who tore his name out of the phone book and pasted it in his scrapbook.
The Hollywood Reporter

The theater was elegant inside, sparkling from weeks of renovating. Usherettes dashed up and down the aisles passing out programs with Judy Garland's picture on the cover and seating the restless customers. And then the lights dimmed and the overture began. One of the best vaudeville bills seen in New York in years followed, a bill that few big stars would care to follow. And then there was an intermission, the warning flicking on and off of lights announcing the resumption of the show, the scurrying back to seats, and darkness again with only two square boxes of light on either side of the stage, each with the simple card announcement, JUDY GARLAND.

Up went the curtain. The stage setting was odd because of its simplicity. A velvet back drop and teasers marking the wing entrances. A chorus of handsome young men danced out on the stage and sang the introductory number—and Judy walked out and began to sing. The number finished, she stepped to the front of the stage and was on her own. She was out of breath. She was flushed. She was scared. She stood in the cone of a brilliant spot light, unable to see beyond it, and she knew that out there were the toughest critics she'd ever have to face. The professionals and the people who wanted her to make good, but who still had to be shown. She laughed, that nervous little, scared chuckle she is noted for, then she excused herself and mopped her face with a silken handkerchief. Then she sang another song.

The applause was definite, but not thunderous. Judy was still scared. Then she did something few other performers would ever dare to do. She announced that her feet were killing her—and that she was going to take off her shoes. And she did. The audience laughed with her—and Judy knew she had them. The next song was better. It was a Garland song, sung from way down deep inside of her, full throated and brilliant in quality. This time the applause was thunderous. Judy was delirious, and you just knew, if you sat there that night, that she was happy.

For almost an hour Judy Garland sang for Broadway, for the wise guys, the swifties and the lads who said nobody could ever bring two-a-day back to the Palace. She sang for the critics, who had made up their minds long ago—and she sang for the folks from the other side of town, the movie-goers who had never forgotten she was a star. Her final number was the best of the lot. She wore a pair of very baggy trousers, a ridiculously huge jacket of black and garish plaids and a tramp's idea of a stiff shirt and black tie. A patch of false black hair, cut male style, came down over her forehead in an idiotic crew cut, and a couple of her front teeth were blacked out. Judy danced onto the stage behind a tall, hungry looking male partner and sang a comedy song of a happy tramp.

They wouldn't let her off the stage. Encore followed encore until Judy could hardly stand up. But each time they called her back, she laughed with happiness—and did another chorus. Finally, there were no more choruses to do, so Judy stepped to the footlights and made an announcement.

"You've been wonderful to me tonight," she said. "And I'll never forget it. Now I want to do something special just for you—for all of you."

She waved the microphone out of the way and sat down on a small patch of carpet at the top of the steps that led to the orchestra pit. The theatricals were over for the evening. The house went completely dark, but the man in the booth upstairs found the tiny figure with his spotlight.

She looked like a rag doll. No glamor. Nothing to bring more than a smile or a chuckle. She sat holding her knees, the ridiculous costume bulky about her, the silly hair piece making her look like a clownish boy. But there was something in her eyes that quieted the audience and held the first-nighters spellbound before she opened her mouth. And then she began to sing.

The song was "Over The Rainbow." It is a child's song—and a child began to sing it. No one who saw her that night and heard Judy Garland sing that song can deny it was one of the most moving experiences they have ever had in the theater. From deep within her heart she sang a plea for the happiness a little girl needed and didn't find. She sang with such sincerity that the notes poured from her as from a flute and were heard in the farthest reaches of the vast auditorium. And while she sang, tears fell from her eyes. And her eyes were closed as though she were remembering when last it was like this with Judy Garland. There wasn't a dry eye in the Palace Theater on Broadway that night—but there wasn't a heavy heart, either. It was a happy time, once again.

When the song was over, Judy got to her feet and stood, holding the battered top hat, her head bowed to the loudest noise she'd ever listened to—the applause of Broadway. And then she spoke again.

"I just want to say," she said, "that I love you."

Judy walked to the wings with those words in her heart. Sid Luft stood there and Hugh Martin and Chuck Walters and Abe Lastfogel and Roger Edens. Happy men, all of them. Then Sid took her to her dressing room and left her alone for a long time.

Sure, Broadway's a funny place, but so is the world. But on Broadway now there is a new custom. At midnight you'll find a crowd of people standing outside the front door of the Palace Theater, waiting for the star to come out. And they're never disappointed. Judy Garland wouldn't do that. She loves them—just as much as they love her.

THE END

"we finally made it"

Frank thought that the site of the wedding was a well-kept secret. He hired a limousine to drive him and Ava from New York to Philadelphia, but when he arrived at Sachs' home, he was greeted by a band of reporters and photographers. "How did these creeps know where we were?" he asked Ava as they got out of the car. Ava said nothing, merely smiled, and ran into the house.

One of the newspaper photographers said to Frank, "How about some wedding pictures?"

"I'm sorry," Frankie explained, "we haven't got room for all you guys. I have one photographer inside. He's going to take the wedding pictures, and prints will be passed out."

"Who wants that stuff?" the cameraman protested.

"You try to take one picture," Sinatra threatened, "and I'll let you have it."

After the wedding, Ava and Frankie flew to Miami, eluded the press in Florida, and finally checked into the Hotel Nacional in Havana where they honeymooned for an entire weekend. Then they flew back to New York where Frank staged his last TV program from the East.

By the middle of November, the Sinatras were back in Hollywood, exceedingly happy and unusually gracious to photographers at the airport.

"How was the trip from New York?" a reporter asked Sinatra.

Frank grinned sickly. "Probably the worst trip we've ever had," he said. "Headwinds all the way."

"We'd like a picture or two of you and Mrs. Sinatra."

Frank nodded and posed with his arm around Ava's waist. He looked tired, but not Ava. She looked very much in love.

Because she likes to adopt a flippant attitude about life and because she has previously been married to Mickey Rooney and Artie Shaw, two gentlemen who do not particularly specialize in marital longevity, Ava has sometimes been accused of being light-hearted about matrimony. This accusation is pure fiction.

Three years ago, before Sinatra walked into her life, Ava was an experienced but unattached girl of 26.

Like most single actresses in Hollywood, she found surprisingly few eligible men worthy of her favors. Not that the boys weren't making a big play for her. It was just that she was attracting the wrong kind of men—married men.

One of these, a world-famous crooner—not Sinatra—phoned a friend of his in the music publishing business, and said,

"You know Ava Gardner pretty well, don't you?"

The friend admitted he knew her.

"I'm just nuts about that dame," the crooner continued. "You've got to introduce us, Sam. I'm telling you. This is a real yen."

Sam phoned Ava. "How about having lunch at the Brown Derby with a friend of mine?"

"What's his name?"

Sam revealed the crooner's identity.

"No soap," Ava said. "He's not only married but he has two kids."

"So what?" Sam insisted. "He doesn't want to elope with you. He just wants to have lunch with you. Honest, that's all.

"Are you kidding?" Ava cracked. "I saw the way he looked at me the other day when I came out of NBC. The answer, Sam, is no."

A few nights later, Ava ran into Sam at a party. The talk veered towards the crooner, and Ava let loose a few words about love.

"I've been married a couple of times myself," Ava said, "but marriage isn't anything I take lightly. To me it's the biggest step any girl can take. When I was divorced from Mickey and Artie, believe me, it broke me up.

"I know what it is for a girl to be married sitting at home, wondering who's out with her husband. The last thing I will ever do, Sam, is to go out with a married man who's living with his wife. If he's legally separated or divorced, that's different. But no one's going to point to me as a house-wrecker."

Ava Gardner, in the 10 years she's been in Hollywood, has changed her mind about many things: career, education, athletics, cars, men, actresses, directors—but never about marriage.

"To me," she says, "marriage is the beginning and the end. It's not an incidental to be worked in between pictures.

Marie Wilson happened to be spending the evening at a local night spot when her house was robbed. "I don't understand how the burglar got in," a friend said later. "Where was your dog?" "Oh, honey," laughed Marie, "he was at Ciro's with me!"

Mickey Novak

It's something a wife has to work at all the time. I've always been glad to do it. All I've ever wanted out of life is a good husband and some children. If I get that, then I can say my life's been a success.

"My career's been a very wonderful thing, but I never started out to be an actress. It just happened. It was a fluke. It won't break my heart to give up my career. Not one bit."

Ava's contract at MGM expires in another year. Under the L. B. Mayer regime she was never too happy at the studio, largely because when he was head of the Culver City lot, Mayer objected strenuously to Ava's romance with Frank.

L. B. called Ava on the carpet after Sinatra had left the studio and told her that Metro had plans for her, big plans. She could be another Greta Garbo, she could be the greatest star in the world. And she was throwing away this future fame for what, for whom? Sinatra!

What Mayer didn't understand about Ava is that given the choice of a husband or a career—Ava will always choose the husband. In Ava's life, the man must always win. For here is one girl who feels her basic destiny is motherhood. To appeal to any other instinct in her makeup is a waste of time. She regards Sinatra not only as a lover but as the future father of her brood.

Wise-guys, of course, have told her that her marriage to Frank will end in unhappiness. "It won't last," a friend of Ava's recently explained. "How can it? Sinatra isn't as mixed up as Artie Shaw, but just look at his position. He's got three kids and a wife by a previous marriage to support. His television show is still not firmly established. In Frank, Ava has got herself a boy who may be on the way down. Success came to him quickly, and at an early age; maybe he still doesn't know how to handle it."

But in Frank's favor is the fact that Ava knew nothing about Mickey Rooney when she married him. She knew even less about Shaw. About Frank Sinatra she knows everything.

A little over a year ago when a reporter asked Ava if she secretly planned on marrying Frank, she said—and she meant it at the time, "I wouldn't want to marry him. I'd rather marry someone who wasn't in show business. Men in show business don't seem to make the best husbands. But for a friend, I couldn't want a better one than Frank. He's wonderful to be around."

As we know now, that friendship ripened into love.

Marriage to Ava means children, lots of children. She herself is the youngest of seven, and she figuratively worships the small army of her nieces and nephews who are scattered all over the South. She is constantly sending them her old clothes and gifts. More than anything else she would like to have a child of her own.

She'd also like to have a house of her own. She turned over the one she had in the Hollywood hills to her sister Bappie. She then rented one down at the Pacific Palisades, because she thought she'd like to be near the beach, only it gets foggy down at the beach very early in the afternoon, and Ava is quick to catch cold.

Sinatra feels the same way, if not about children, certainly about a house. Since his wedding to Ava, the only house he's owned has been the Palm Springs mansion, and he hasn't been able to get down there very frequently because of his TV commitments.

Marriage to Ava has been the one overriding thought in Sinatra's mind ever since Nancy filed for divorce last October. In order to speed up the proceedings, Frank even waived the service of any papers in the action. He asked that Nancy's case be tried as a default case as soon as possible.

Friends say that while he was working on his television show out of New York, he was amazed to read in the newspapers about Ava's going out with Richard Greene. A phone call from Ava cleared that one up in a hurry.

What had actually happened was that Ava had gone out with her business manager, Ben Cole. Frances and Van Heflin were along, and so, too, was Richard Greene. The British actor happened to give Ava a lift to a night club, and that's what started the silly rumor that Ava and Frankie had split up.

At this point, the only possibility of a break in the Ava-Frankie union lies in their own personalities. These two are deeply in love, and there are no rivals.

"People keep telling me," Ava says, "that Frank and I are bound to have career trouble. What career trouble? I have two more years left at Metro, and Frank isn't tied to anything but his TV show. If any career trouble shows up, we're pretty grown-up kids. We can work it out.

"In my book, the marriage comes first. After marriage, it's children, and then if there's any time or energy left, that's for the career.

"Frank and I have both been married before, and in a way, that's a good thing. We know how little irritations can develop into big quarrels and what to do to avoid them. I also have a pretty good idea of what demands show business makes on an entertainer—something I didn't have when I was married to Mickey and Artie.

"Marriage means an awful lot to me at this point. This Christmas, I was 29. Next year I'll be 30. Where I come from a girl who's been married and hasn't become a mother by the time she's 30 is peculiar.

"So, as far as I'm concerned, the first one can't come soon enough." THE END

"How about a swim? Gordy suggested to his slender blonde wife.

"Beat you to it!" cried Sheila, and like a pale Diana she raced across the brick patio to her dressing room, dropped her clothes, and bounced into the pool.

Lying in bed, tired but completely relaxed after the dip, she couldn't refrain from a few party post-mortems. "The turkey was good, didn't you think?"

Gordie, from the borderline of sleep, muttered, "Uh-huh."

"Weren't the kids sweet? They didn't fuss once."

"Uh-huh."

"It is a good house for a party, isn't it, dear?"

MacRae sleepily, "Uh-huh."

"Oh, go to sleep, you great big romantic lover."

Plainly, the MacRae house is a natural for charades, parties, children, and for getting away from all three.

After house-hunting for a year and a half, Sheila and Gordon found the only house in all San Fernando Valley that combines the triple features that their type of family life requires. It has a separate studio for Gordon, plenty of space (inside and out) for three jet-like children, and an eastern look to remind Sheila of back home on Long Island.

The MacRae house was originally built by a commercial artist named Anthony Loomis, who did most of his work at home. Mr. Loomis used a two-story guest house as his studio. The top floor is one large room with a good north window and plenty of uncluttered space. Downstairs, there are two guest rooms that also serve as dressing rooms for the pool. Gordon merely stepped into the big empty studio once, and it made up his mind for him. He says he bought the house "in order to find a place where I could work at home."

Soon after he'd moved the family into the house, Gordon told his busy wife to go ahead with her decorating plans. He'd take care of the studio. With the experienced help of one brick-layer from Warner Brothers, he added a large fireplace, book shelves and a compact bar to the room. Then he and his friend layed the Flaxtex carpet from the old MacRae house, painted one wall forest green, and papered two with a bold hunting print. The last thing they did was to move in the baby grand piano and a stack of music, and it's been the MacRae Rehearsal Hall ever since.

Sheila's enthusiasm for the house ran equally as high as she counted up its good points for rearing three children. Number one was its more than comfortable size. Their last home had one family bath. This one boasted five baths plus 12 comfortable rooms.

When it came time to assign people and purposes to the dozen rooms, Sheila set aside definite areas for the children. Because Gordon gets home too late for the children's evening meal, she turned the breakfast room into a second dining room for the youngsters. What was intended for a den, she furnished with small scale chairs, low tables and a television set. She calls this one the children's study. It's a place where they can entertain friends without disturbing their parents or being interfered with. About five-thirty every afternoon, the neighborhood gang gathers in this room to watch "Howdy-Doody," and at times like these, Gordon remarks that "study" is a slight misnomer and that "bedlam room" might be a good substitute.

THREE-YEAR-OLD Gordon, Jr. (Gar for short) has the room next to his parents on the first floor. It has practically no furniture because Gar is just beginning to out-grow his allergies to dust, wool, fur, and a lot of other things. In place of rocking chairs and a chest of drawers, the only furniture is his bed and a delightfully gay wallpaper called Happy Valley.

The two upstairs bedrooms and baths belong to the girls. Outside Heather's blue and white room, a balcony runs the width of the house. She keeps her pair of hamsters here. At this stage of her life, keeping her pets well-caged is her sole concern.

Meredith is a more sophisticated child. She has French hand-painted wallpaper in her room. She'd asked her parents to paper the room with butterflies, but the nearest her mother could get to that was a French wallpaper with turtles, bugs and flowers as its motif. Meredith's room opens onto a small sun deck. So far she doesn't utilize it as a beauty-aid but she will in time. At the moment she's found that it's a perfect spot to set up her water colors and finger paints. The view is inspirational, and no one complains if she spills a little.

If you ask the MacRae children why they like their new home, Meredith, who's the spokesman for the trio, says, "There are so many things to do." They have the heated pool in which all three children swim the year round. There are swings and a playground slide. The macadam motor court in front and the brick patio in back are great for bicycle-riding. And the whole family plays an improvised game of croquet on the lawn.

The house proper sits on a high rise of ground in the middle of two acres of rambling, uncultivated hillside. The land is just wild enough to appeal to children's imaginations. It's criss-crossed with woodsy paths and studded with gnarled live oak trees, that are fine for climbing. And to make the deal super the MacRaes are surrounded by a neighborhood jammed with youngsters.

Meredith, Heather, and Gar are so busy in their new surroundings that they haven't time to be problems. But, as any parent will agree, even the nicest children can be too much with you at times. When this happens, Sheila and Gordon retreat to their room. The master bedroom suite is off in a wing by itself. By disconnecting the telephone and closing the door, they can forget the rest of the family for an hour or two.

The big, square room is so comfortable with its own fireplace and door opening onto the patio that Sheila decided to furnish it as a sitting room. She used a deep, unbedroomy blue on the walls and bedspread. She had one of Gordon's favorite wing-back chairs from their former house recovered in a reddish early American print. She placed it invitingly between the fire and a table loaded with books. Whenever Gordon takes time to stretch out full-length to read, Sheila, a serious writer in her own right, rolls out her typing table and works on her nostalgic project, a narrative, historical poem about Long Island.

His wife's nostalgia for the East Coast, (New England, and Long Island, in particular) is something Gordon likes to kid her about. But after he tires of joking, it's apparent that he's an Easterner, too. Their furnishings reflect this.

The two main rooms, for example, are filled with early American antiques that they've collected during nine years of marriage. Fortunately the new house was large so that they didn't have to part with a single heirloom—not even the paintings of famous American doorways made by Gordon's grandfather, Albert Sonn. In the dining room, for instance, is a cranberry press that ceased to function long ago but is kept in a conspicuous spot because it reminds them of Cape Cod and cranberry bogs. The breakfront, filled with their dishes and linen, once held nuts and bolts in a Pennsylvania hardware store. The lazy-susan table and Windsor chairs are not genuine antiques but good reproductions. George Montgomery, Dinah Shore's versatile husband, made the furniture to the MacRae's specifications and to correspond in style, if not in age, to the rest of the furnishings they own.

Most of the pieces in the living room were also acquired over a period of years. Before he became so busy with pictures, radio, and recordings, Gordon liked to prowl around old furniture shops from Boston to Santa Barbara. He can recall where every chair, table and ash tray came from and how well it's stood the test of five MacRaes and their friends.

Until a year ago, it had always been his aim to own an authentic New England farmhouse in keeping with his collection of early American furniture. Somehow, fate interfered. Gordon left New York for a contract at Warner Brothers. The children increased in number and it looked as if the MacRaes were destined for a larger home—willy-nilly. "We discovered that a Connecticut salt box is hard to find in Southern California," Gordy explains. "But when we saw this house, we sort of closed our eyes to its New Orleans exterior. It was perfect for us so we accepted the southern facade. Now I find myself doing as Sheila does. When friends ask, I simply say we own a farmhouse."

The night of the party Sheila got one more nostalgic inspiration. She dove into their collection of unhung pictures and pulled out a Currier & Ives print called American Winter Scene and hung it over the fireplace.

"There," she pointed out to Gordon, "that's to remind us of the kind of winters we're missing." And then she kissed him because Connecticut or California, winter or summer, the MacRaes are a happy twosome, and the house they live in reflects their love. THE END

That's Tony. But it isn't all of him. To understand all of Tony you have to go a long way back. Someone once said about him, "All he wants is to see his picture on the cover of MODERN SCREEN." But he wants a lot more than that.

A person's very first memory will tell you much about him. It is not what he has experienced in childhood that counts, but the impression that it has left on him. Tony remembers the time he was three years old and standing on a street corner crying his eyes out because he was lost. A woman saw him and knelt down to ask him his name but he couldn't remember it. He was crying so hard he'd forgotten who he was! Finally, his mother found him and took him home.

Also in his memory is the time he was going to the hospital to have his tonsils removed. He was riding in a car, although his family didn't own one, and with him was a little girl whose tonsils were headed for the same fate. Tony was crying but the little girl just sat there sucking her lollipop. Tony couldn't figure out why he was crying so hard and she wasn't—just sitting there, sucking on that lollipop. Why was he so scared? And why was he the only one? Although Tony is the best natured guy in the world there are fears and lonely places and violence in his nature. He has a high temper but he learned to control it a long while ago.

He was 13 when he got fighting mad at one kid. He doesn't remember the reason, but he can still feel the emotional impact. This other boy had said or done something that sent Tony into a wild fury. He had one big desire—to beat that kid to a pulp—but to his amazement he found that his rage had stripped him of bodily control. "There I was swinging like a mad man," he said, "but I wasn't landing a single punch. I was all out of control. I got beat up by the kid who was in control."

FRIGHT does the same thing to Tony that anger does. He remarks when he was on a submarine in the Navy. "We were in some trouble," he says. "The fear was awful. I could taste it in my mouth." (Tony is prone to understate the circumstance but never the emotion.) There was no one to turn to. In his terror and desperation he doubled up his fist and hit it hard on the bulkhead, so hard that he broke three bones. It was only later that he wondered why he had done it. "We came out of it all right," he recalls.

He got hurt in Guam; his legs were temporarily paralyzed. Tony, being the kind of wildly imaginative person he is, knew he would never walk again. Lying in the hospital he was afraid to touch his legs, he hated them so. "They were like some spider or something," he said. And always he'd dream of running, and playing football—a game he'd never played.

Tony Curtis has a loving heart and the need for love. He is so outgoing that he is hurt and surprised when he experiences a rebuff. This is an interesting sidelight on his character, for his background (his was a poor Jewish family and his playground was the streets of New York) would seem to foster aloofness and suspicion. But he can be thrown into the depths of despair when he comes on the lot and says "Hi" to someone without having the "Hi" returned. The slightest "brush" upsets and depresses him.

One of the most awful rejections of his life occurred shortly after he arrived in Hollywood. A friend he had worked with in New York told him to look up a certain actor and his wife. Tony did and he liked them as he is inclined to like everyone. In fact, this is one of Tony's great vulnerabilities—he lays himself wide open to being hurt. He is so amazed and delighted with his career and his having, as he puts it, "good clothes, a car and someone to recognize me on the street," that he thinks everyone else should be delighted, too.

Well, the actor and his wife took advantage of Tony, although he didn't know it. They welcomed him to their home and wanted to see so much of him that the actor had to drive right out to Tony's lot to see him. Then the actor, having gained admittance to the lot, barged into producers' offices looking for a job. When asked how he happened to be inside the studio he said, "I'm here with a pass from my friend, Tony Curtis—you know, that wacky, brash kid you just signed."

When Tony realized what was happening he didn't say anything. He just kept away. But he had left some records at their place, and he went back to reclaim them. The couple had seemed nice. Perhaps he'd been mistaken. He asked to play his records, and then they let him have it. He was a boor, they told him in effect, he didn't know his way around. Didn't he know everybody in town was laughing at him? There was a fight—verbal, this time—and Tony, shocked at this betrayal, walked home, fighting back the tears.

What is Tony Curtis really like? That's a hard question to answer, because Tony is a complicated human being.

You might say that his love of shoes—he owns 20 pairs of all kinds—is an affectation. But it isn't. This is the actor fetish. Joan Crawford is mad for shoes. My daughter, Joan Evans, has 30 pairs, which is not unusual among actresses. Tony had trouble saying why he likes shoes. "Shoes knock me out. I don't know—they're so nice and crisp and neat." When I pressed him for a reason, he said, "If I said it was because I didn't have so many shoes when I was a kid that would be too easy, wouldn't it?" "Yes," I said, "that would be too easy." So I told him what I thought. Shoes symbolize going somewhere—walking, running, onwardness. And it is the actor's ambition to "go somewhere." An actor can't stand still. Tony loved this breakdown—which may or may not be right. He had never thought about it before, but his eager mind took up the idea delightedly.

The first movie star Tony met when he came to Hollywood was Ann Blyth. He was staggered by her. She talked to him! She was warm and friendly. And when he at last mustered the courage to ask her for a date, she accepted him. What luck for Bernie Schwartz! She was so nice and they talked a lot about acting. When a big role came along (The Prince Who Was A Thief), and the studio wanted to know if fairly inexperienced Tony Curtis could handle the title role, Ann made the camera test with him! She played the Piper Laurie part, helped him, encouraged him. He thinks Ann is wonderful.

But it was all quite different when he saw Janet Leigh. Although they met at a publicity party and although he knew she was a big star, Tony felt differently about her. She was, to him, just a lovely girl—a girl he wanted to know better. But she was going with another young man at the time and Tony is no poacher. He has been lost so many times himself that he would not—even if he could—cause loss to another human being. But when Janet and her beau drifted apart Tony was ringing her telephone asking for a date. Tony was in love, and if there was anybody in Hollywood who didn't know it that person was deaf and blind.

TID-BITS ON TONY

Tony Curtis prefers gray and blue suits . . . his dad, now a tailor, was once a well-known actor in Budapest . . . Jerry Lewis is his best pal . . . he's 5' 10½", weighs 158 . . . and resents studio publicity that says he is a six-footer . . . he calls his mother "Josephine" . . . her name is Helen . . . while in the Navy, he was injured loading a torpedo . . . he was paralyzed and hospitalized at Guam for seven weeks . . . they've called him "the baron of beefcake" . . . he thinks his barechested publicity helped him get there . . . he takes fencing, boxing and dancing lessons . . . when he works late, Janet often goes with him and sleeps in his dressing room . . . he was one of the first veterans to study acting on the G.I. Bill . . . he smokes less than a pack of cigarettes a day . . . before he got in the movies, his stage name was James Curtis . . . he's a miserable speller . . . can't tango . . . he owns 43 shirts . . . collects jazz records . . . he suggested his new name to the studio after reading Anthony Adverse . . . now they've cut it down to Tony . . . his great-grandfather was a circus strong man nearly 8 feet tall . . . he drives a second-hand Buick . . . his eyes are very very blue.

It was his marriage to Janet that was the first signpost on the road to finding himself. Their honeymoon was a test. They married, as you know, while Tony and Piper Laurie were making a personal appearance tour in the East. Immediately after the wedding Janet returned to California to start a movie and to find a place for them to live. Tony finished the tour, he thought, and joined Janet on the coast to prepare for Hear No Evil in which he plays a deaf and dumb prizefighter. The next day he was sent out on tour again and the day he returned his father had a heart attack.

Tony never left his father's bedside. He was out of his mind with worry. It helped that Janet was with him—but it didn't stop the anxiety. And it was not until his father was out of danger—completely out of danger—that he could step into his new role—Tony Curtis, husband. "But it seems to me," Janet said, "if we could survive those separations and this worry we can survive anything."

Tony is much more responsible now that he has a wife, now that his father will be unable to work for at least a year. When he didn't have money he always spent it. "When I had 20 bucks I'd blow 20 bucks," he said. "What's 20 bucks?" Now it's different. He doesn't throw money away.

But the most important thing that's happened to Tony is the release his acting has brought for his tempers, his enthusiasm, his energy. He doesn't fly off in all directions so much now for he knows that when there's something in him that's about to burst he can let it burst in front of the camera. And that's great for him.

But more than that, Tony has learned a kind of mental control. As he said, "When I first came out here everything was so new to me. There were all new things in resolution. But I have found a workable way to make things go. You get a concept or idea and you think, 'This is wild.' Now I can sit down and work 'em out. I've been able to transfer thought into a workable outlet. It's hard to explain, but I know what I mean and I've got it."

This, as far as I know, is what Tony Curtis is really like. THE END

she doesn't like her type!

(Continued from page 34) individual who doesn't make plans. She says, "You plan ahead and you expect too much. Too often the realization is a let down." Take, for example, what happened recently. Marty Melcher, her husband, was ready to go to work. She was bidding him goodbye when he asked, "Can you be packed in an hour?"

"Sure," Doris said. "Why?"

He explained that he thought it would be fun to go to San Francisco to see some dear friends off to Honolulu. The friends were a doctor and his wife whom the Melchers met in Palm Springs. They are from the Middle West and when Doris was plugging her records there she stayed at their home. Like almost all of Doris' friends, they are older people.

Doris packed in an hour. And as she and Marty left the house she called to Alma, "Mother, we're going." They hopped in the car and headed for San Francisco. "They were so surprised to see us," Doris recalls. "It was wonderful. We bought presents for everyone and it turned out so much better than if we'd planned it."

On the way to San Francisco something occurred which is a real tipoff to Doris' nature. Marty was discussing taxes and money. Doris hates to talk about money. "I don't like to know what I have in the bank," she says. "I never worry about money problems—just as long as there's enough for me to buy the few things I want. But I hate to talk about it."

Marty, a capable agent and business manager, just puts the income tax return in front of her and says, "Sign here."

But there was something he had to talk to her about now and, having her cooped up in a swiftly moving car, he figured she couldn't walk away from him as she so often does at home when the subject of money comes up.

So he talked. He talked for miles, and ended the talk with a question mark. Doris heard the rising inflection and knew some comment was expected of her. She, too, asked a question. "Do you think," she asked, "we should have green or yellow draperies in the den?"

She had not heard a word he'd said. For Doris can shut her ears to what she does not want to hear. Tell her she has an annoying business appointment. Tell her she must make a decision about something before she is ready to make it. She will tune you out. She will look at you with those big blue eyes, her head cocked to one side in a listening attitude, and you know you haven't made contact.

What is she thinking about when she has that preoccupied look? Doris knows herself better than she thinks she does. She realizes she is preoccupied. "I'm wondering what we'll have for dinner," she says. "Or, I'm remembering to ask the gardener what kind of flowers would look best growing in the back yard." She knows this is wrong. She often has to apologize, "I'm sorry, I didn't catch the last part of what you said," when she has not caught any of it. But she can't help it because, she says, "My mind is always buzzing."

WHAT else enters into Doris' complicated make up?

Her passion for cleanliness and neatness goes far back into her childhood and is a dominant motivation in her life. It seems connected with the way she displays a fit of temper—like a sudden storm that is gone as quickly as it came, leaving the sun to shine. It also accounts for her way of life.

When she was a little girl if she found one small spot on her dress she would change it. Sometimes she would wear as many as three cotton dresses in one day. Even now her mother is baffled by this sort of behavior. Alma says, "You take too many showers. You'll wash all the oil out of your skin." Doris showers two or three times a day and shampoos her hair daily.

When she was a little girl in Cincinnati her mother often took her to visit a certain friend. On the dining room table in this woman's house there was a large china swan. But instead of flowers floating in the bowl, as was intended, there were rubber bands and used pencils, paper clips, stubs of theater tickets and bobby pins. Little Doris had to put her hands behind her back to keep her fingers from straightening the catch-all. She has never forgotten the swan.

Now her temper rises when she sees disorder. It bothers her when someone moves an ash tray to a place it doesn't belong. She has to bite her tongue to keep from scolding a guest who absent-mindedly rearranges the objects on a coffee table. "It gives me such satisfaction to see everything in order," she explains.

Marty says, "I'm always being inspected and I love it." Before he goes to his office Doris looks him over to see that his clothes are spotless. "They always are, of course," she declares with pride. "Marty is one of the neatest people I've ever known," and this seems very important to her.

HER cleanliness goes even further. Try to tell her an off-color joke or a piece of malicious gossip and she is really preoccupied. She will not hear, she simply refuses to listen. As a result, people seldom tell her. She neither drinks nor smokes and no hard liquor (only beer), is ever served at their house.

Doris' heart and mind must be in order, too. A uniquely unambitious girl, she wants no more than what she has. According to Doris, she has everything. A husband she loves and who loves her; a loving mother and a devoted aunt who live with them; a darling 10-year-old son, Terry; her beautiful home. And, most important of all to Doris, she has "peace of mind."

Her home is filled with antiques. This is a new passion which she developed after she came to California. Although it is not in her character to think of the past, she contradicts herself by this affinity for the old. "Things that are old just have more charm for me, that's all," she says. "They have more beauty. Old copper, old wood—they're different from new stuff. But I never think about the people who have used the things before I did. No, it isn't that. I can't explain."

But she can explain why she loses things. She loses earrings, for example, "because I hate 'em. I always pull them off my ears." And she loses gloves "because I don't wear 'em. I just carry them."

She can shut her ears to what she doesn't want to hear and she can lose what she hates or doesn't use.

Once, before she was married to Marty, a former Warner Brothers press agent set up an appointment for an interview at her house. Interviewer and publicity man arrived at the appointed hour. Doris wasn't home. No one was. Later, she was full of apologies. Naturally, the press agent was cross. "See here," he said, "I don't know what you earn but it's a good sized sum. Why don't you get a secretary to warn you when you have appointments? That way you won't be confused."

She looked at him wide-eyed. "But I'm not confused," she said. "It's other people who are."

He had to laugh. "Don't you dare get a secretary," he said. "Anybody who figures like that must stay like that."

Only a few times has Doris got off on the wrong track in her relationships with people. In Doris' work she must, as can be imagined, meet a lot of strange birds. If you bring somebody to her with an apology—someone who perhaps can help her career but is on the horror side personally—she will say to you later, "Why, I thought he was rather sweet."

Once, however, she was really annoyed by someone who happened to be a fellow actor. He was pompous and pretentious. He tried to steal scenes from her, often didn't bother to learn his lines and definitely let it be known that he considered Doris an untalented little upstart.

It got under Doris' skin. "I don't like him at all," Doris said to a friend. But even as she said it she got the preoccupied look. This time it was her own words she wasn't listening to. But instead of thinking about plants for the back yard or draperies for the den she had something much more important on her mind. What she was thinking was: "There is nothing wrong with that person. It's just my thinking about him that's wrong." So, Doris said later, "I changed my thinking. I saw him as sweet and wonderful and that's the way he was. Now we are friends." For Doris believes that love is reflected in love.

She has never been disillusioned in people. She has never experienced what almost every Hollywood star has known—the so-called friend who loves you not for yourself but because you are a star. She has never, to her knowledge, been played for a sucker. She says, "You get out of life what you expect. If you expect people to do you dirt they will."

She always believes that if you can really communicate with another person you will never have misunderstandings.

Sam Goldwyn was scolding a newspaperman who told Sam that he doubted the veracity of a story his press department just released.

"The story isn't exactly the truth," admitted Goldwyn, "but we have the facts to prove it."

H. W. Kellick

Here is another facet of her personality. She goes to bed around ten-thirty at night so she can get up at eight in the morning. When she was traveling with bands she worked until all hours and had to sleep until one or two o'clock in the afternoon. She hated it. She felt she was wasting her life. Rather, she felt she was wasting her days and she likes days better than nights. She is a very resourceful girl and there is so much she wants to do.

She would like to have a dress shop. She loves clothes and she loves to shop, although she admits she doesn't have the imagination to be a designer. "I have to see the finished product before I know how it will look," she says. But she knows she has good taste and she believes women would be thrilled "to come into my shop and find such nice, pretty things."

Sometimes she toys with the idea of managing a hotel in a town like Carmel. When she was traveling she saw so many mismanaged hotels, and she thinks she could make a hotel comfortable, attractive and homelike for weary travellers.

She also loves houses, but she knows she could not be an interior decorator. Her son Terry knows this, too.

One night Doris came home from an upsetting day at the studio, and was tired. "I think I'll quit the movies," she said.

Terry said, "Oh no! What would you do?"

"Well," Doris said, "I could be an interior decorator."

"No, you couldn't," Terry said. "Your client might want modern and you'd just walk out of his house."

Knowing all this about Doris you might come to the conclusion that she isn't the type to be a movie star. Actually, becoming a star was never a big drive in her life even though she played "movie star" when she was a little girl and, later, sat enthralled when Betty Grable appeared at the Shubert Theater. Doris went trouping as a singer because she thought it would be exciting to travel all over the country, and she thought it would be good experience. Not experience for a career, but for living. "I never wanted to be somebody," she says. "I just wanted to be married and have a family."

She was not the type to come to California and work in a drive-in hoping to be "discovered." It was by accident and not by design that she got in pictures. And if it ever interfered with her happiness she would give it up "like that." When she hears stories about the real glamor stars of Hollywood she asks, "How can it be worth it if you have to live like that?" And she honestly forgets that her name is in lights at Radio City Music Hall and that she is the star of many movies, including her latest, Warner Brothers' I'll See You In My Dreams.

She doesn't understand the girls who drive and push for stardom. "It's like this," she says. "When you're looking around to fall in love you never do. Then when you least expect it love falls right into your lap. If you try too hard for anything—love, a husband, a career—you get too tense. You must take everything in its course. What should happen comes naturally."

A SECRETARY at Doris' studio says, "I've never given a present to a star in my life. I couldn't afford anything that the average movie star would ever look at. But I just bought Doris Day a present because I knew she would like it. It cost a dollar. I saw an ad for it in a magazine and thought of her."

The present was a mystery story that could only be solved by working the jigsaw puzzle that went with it. Doris loves mystery stories. She also loves jigsaw puzzles. Doris liked that present from the secretary as much as a diamond bracelet—even more. She has no place to go to wear a diamond bracelet. She read the mystery story and worked the jigsaw puzzle at home.

Doris thinks of herself as just an average, normal person. Relaxed as she is, though, she is impatient. Her penmanship is scribbly because she thinks faster than she can write. Her mother, recounting some daily happening, is prone to relate the story in minute detail. Doris says, "Come on now. Let's get to the point."

Doris has had many experiences which she would like to forget. But she has no regrets about the past since she acquired maturity. That's why she thinks she has friends like Charlotte Greenwood and her husband who are older than she. She gravitates towards mature people because, "I try so hard to be mature in my own thinking."

She is impressed by good people—sound, normal people, and draws away from pompous ones. She is en rapport with people of a religious turn of mind. She believes that drinking is a "stupid escape" and she has seen a lot of drinking. She has known people who went without food to buy a bottle of hootch. "For what?" Doris wants to know.

It is because neither she nor Marty drink that they find cocktail parties dull and so have acquired the reputation of being anti-social. Same way with night clubs. They go only if there's an act they want to see. They watch it, and leave.

And they resent the money they might spend in night clubs. For every spare dollar they have goes into the house and the back yard (which Doris calls a "back yard" and not a "patio"). They love their home so much that they always return from a vacation days ahead of schedule and their parties are always given at home. They are daytime parties, by the way, with the crowd gathering at noon to play volley ball and swim. (The pool is not a concession to stardom but because they like to swim.) Terry is in charge of the soft drink and beer bar and when the guests are hungry they toss hamburgers and frankfurters on the barbecue pit. Doris loves to eat.

She is as naive as a child, but, although she doesn't realize it, there is much that is profound in her. For example, she once said, "It's not what you have, it's what you can do with what you have." It was a throwaway line, but when she was taxed with the reason she had come up with this truth she explained about the trailer. When she came to California she lived in a trailer. There was no hot water except what was heated over a stove that burned Butane. This so blackened the pots and pans that when Doris had finished with the dishes she was covered with grease. This was the girl who loves to be clean. She had to market every day because the trailer was so small there was no place to store supplies. This was the girl with the will for order. Yet she was happy. After she became a star and had a lovely, spacious home Doris, who seldom looks back, looked back to her life in the trailer with no regrets. "When you can be happy living like that," she said, "you can be happy anywhere."

Doris Day, looking at herself in the mirror, had observed that she didn't like her type today. But whether she liked it or not, it was Doris—for better or worse. And the interesting thing is, she has always been like this, and probably always will be. Not so many girls can be that lucky!

"I don't go out with a different fellow every night the way people would have you think. I went out with Vincent Edwards a couple of times before I left for Europe. But he and I used to go to the same school in Brooklyn—we have a lot of background stuff we share. Then, too, he looks like Burt Lancaster—he's on TV now and we talk about a medium that is new and interesting to me."

"You move fast," I told her. "You get off the plane babbling about Vittorio Gassmann, Vince Edwards meets you at the foot of the ramp. Farley Granger phones you that evening from New York. Gassmann is swinging on the telephone from Rome. And a couple of nights later you're dancing cheek to cheek with Dan Dailey at Ciro's."

"Oh that," Shelley said. "You know I doubt if Dan will ever take me out again. Dan and I were having a jolly time when Vince came up to our table. He was feeling no pain and I felt it might get to be uncomfortable so I asked him to dance. Then Dan asked him if he didn't want to join the party—but he didn't. And that was that."

Remember it was Shelley who once said: "Other girls collect bracelet charms, autographs, records. I collect beaus." Also don't forget it was Shelley who was voted by her class at Thomas Jefferson High in New York as "The girl most likely to get into trouble." Well if they meant man trouble, Shelley dotes on it.

Now, at 28 she has found the continental man. She has learned there is a type of lovemaking more romantic than the good old American give and take. She knows now that a European can hand you a rose and say a poetic something that makes your blood tingle, where an American sends you a box of roses with the card written hastily by the florist's clerk. It's a brand new field in a territory where Shelley was pretty much at home.

"So what's this Italian, Vittorio Gassmann, got that our men haven't? I persisted.

Shelley simply said, "You couldn't print it" and, with her, it was an understatement.

"How did you meet him? After all you were with Farley in Rome and—"

"I wasn't with Farley then. You see I had ordered some beautiful clothes in Rome and after we'd been to Israel I had to go back for the final fittings. So Farley went on to Paris from Israel and I flew back to Rome to get my dresses. Frank Lattimore was in Rome and he'd been awfully nice to us on our first visit. He took me to the ballet and Vittorio was there. He had seen me in A Place In The Sun because he knew someone who was working on the dubbing of the picture and they let him see it. So he knew who I was and he knew my work. When I saw him I wanted to know who he was, because he was one of the handsomest men I've ever seen—it was a very natural thing that I'd ask about him. Lattimore told me, 'he's the Marlon Brando of Italy.' Someone else referred to him as the 'Laurence Olivier of Italy'—so I guess he's the tops. They also told me he had the reputation of being a very remote man—devoted to his art and an attractive and brilliant actor. I was flattered when he paid me such attention right from the start."

I said, "But I hear he is married."

"Oh, no. He has been married but he's been separated from his wife for five years." And when I asked Shelley if he intended to get a divorce she said, "I don't know. After all, we only knew each other for one week. He introduced me to his mother and sister. He comes from a wonderful family. We weren't happy about having to be separated so soon. Vittorio wanted me to go to Paris with him but I explained that I had a picture waiting and had to come back; that my European holiday was over. But since I am home he has asked me to write to his mother."

I was surprised that Shelley tore herself away at that particular moment and I told her so. She topped my frankness with her statement:

"So am I. I ought to have my head examined. I was suspended by the studio—that's something about me that wasn't made public. I probably make less than Francis the mule. I've made six pictures for them this year—including this one I'm starting now—and they've made about $150,000 on me in loanouts."

"Well," I told her, "you always run the pictures you make and you certainly run your men. I suppose you know that European men run their women?"

"I gathered that," Shelley's voice sounded strangely meek, "and I'm prepared to be run. Vittorio wanted to go to Paris with me so we could talk the situation over with Farley. He thought Farley was my fiance and that I'd have trouble explaining things, and he was very anxious to get everything straightened out. But I didn't think it was such a good idea. Now that I'm home he telephones me and I get three or four letters a week."

I remarked they must be pretty hot love letters but Shelley said, "No, we talk about acting and art. We have the big things in our lives in common."

If present plans work out Shelley tells me that Vittorio will come to Hollywood to spend Christmas and New Year's with her. He is working on a picture also and everything depends on its finish date. If he cannot make the trip here, Shelley says she will try to go back to Italy after she has made Untamed.

At the time of this discussion Shelley had not yet told Farley all the details of her big romance. "But I think he's got an idea about it," she said. "He asked me what kept me in Rome so long and I explained that the dresses I'd ordered weren't ready."

"You'll have to face this sooner or later," I told her. "Do you think Farley will be angry?"

Shelley reflected a moment and finally said, "No. I feel that he will be happy if he thinks I am. He thinks I ought to take it easy. He thinks I ought to get to know this fellow better."

Then I put it to her straight, "You really feel you'd like to have a foreigner running your life?" I asked. "Yes," she said, "I really think I would and I certainly hope he does."

This is, in a way, the culmination of a six weeks holiday trip which was planned by Shelley and Farley in the days when Farl was head man in her life. Shelley had never been to Europe and Farley had. "He was in love with Paris the way a guy is in love with a girl," Shelley said. But she had a picture to make—Phone Call From a Stranger—and she fussed and fumed over it because she was afraid shooting would not be finished in time for her to catch the plane. Shelley is dynamite when an idea hits her, and this was an obsession. Right then her big idea was to get the part finished on the dot. Jean Negulesco, who was directing her, intimated that sometimes haste makes waste and when his warning rolled off Shelley's back like water off a duck, the climate on the set became uncomfortable. Negulesco, a Rumanian, has a touch of temperament to match the Viennese, Polish and Russian blend that boils in the girl who was born Shirley Schrift in St. Louis, Missouri. There were times when the director intimated that if he never saw her again it would be too soon. But people get over their tantrums with Shelley, especially when they want her to play one of those inimitable tramps. Shelley can play a floozy like nobody else. She has a theory about that: "Never forget that a floozy in love isn't just a floozy—she's something else again. It takes more than a cheap showy dress, a feather boa and the wrong kind of shoes to play a tarty part. It has to be in the heart . . . in the mind . . . love and sorrow can hit the roundheel hard, they're the elemental things, the rest is just the shell."

By the time Shelley hit Paris she'd forgotten the rough moments on the sound stage. Paris was a ball. She and Farley went to the night clubs every evening and daytimes she'd see the sights and buy clothes. They had a little Hillman-Minx and they'd drive down the boulevards top speed with much horn tooting. And after the night club sessions Farley would pile all the six-foot tall chorus girls from the Lido into his little car and he and Shelley would take off for Les Halles for onion soup and champagne. "I told Farl his idea of the Marshall Plan was feeding chorus beauts at dawn," Shelley said.

"I had a miserable cold most of the time," she added, "but you can't crawl off to bed the first time you hit Paris, so I carried on. They have regular little revues in the night clubs and their approach to entertainment is very fresh and diverting. At St. Germain de Pres they had Tommy Dorsey and his band and we put on a big party one night. First thing I knew I was singing 'A Good Man is Hard to Find'—it was that kind of a time."

Shelley, who got to the top in pictures the hard way and knows the value of a dollar, rebelled at some of the Paris prices: "When Dior asked me $1,400 for an evening gown I said it just wasn't worth it and walked out. We work hard for our money over here and you think twice before you spend that much on a single dress. But at Jacques Heim I found some lovely things for a whole lot less."

In London Farley and Shelley were welcomed with open arms. All the young players in the theater and screen world entertained them. Shelley loved the British way—"they go to work at noon, they dine at eight or nine or even later—they love to give parties and there is plenty of time to dress. I've never seen such parties as the English can give. They turn on the lights and make the fountains play for you. We had wonderful times. The night of the Ivor Novello memorial was the top—the most wonderful thing I've ever seen.

"That night I wore my most beautiful dress—green satin veiled in black lace. I spent a lot of time on myself because I knew all the beauties in London would be there so I wanted to look my best. Farley couldn't believe his eyes when he saw me. I really looked pretty good—you'd hardly recognize me. I told Farl that I never had time in Hollywood to go into this dressing thing in such a big way. We're always in such a hurry. You work until six and jump into a tub and then into your gown. It takes time for a real production. I wish we could slow our tempo a little . . . leisure is very satisfying."

Elizabeth Taylor was coming out of the studio when she was accosted by a very tiny fan who asked for her autograph and added: "Do you mind printing your name? I can't read writing yet."

Irving Hoffman in The Hollywood Reporter

Shelley has something more valuable than mere beauty but her early experiences in Hollywood gave her a fixation on the subject. She couldn't get a job anywhere. Casting directors would say, "But you're not good-looking enough for the part." Or producers would tell her, "You're not pretty enough for leads and you're too good looking for character roles." So she fell between two types. At Metro they made her up to look like Lucille Ball and when she objected they said, "Well, you don't want to look like yourself, do you?" At Columbia they tried to make her look like Rita Hayworth. At 20th, Betty Grable was the model. Then they gave her up and told her she just couldn't make the grade. She went back to New York in disgust and got a job playing the role of Ado Annie in Oklahoma, which Celeste Holm had been doing. She stopped trying to look and act like other people and played straight Shelley Winters. Suddenly everyone discovered she had talent. She went after the job of the waitress in the Colman film herself and failed on the first test. George Cukor got to thinking it over and gave her a second test. When they tried to find her she was playing a walk-on at Metro for $100 to earn enough money to get back to New York. She knows now that she's got what it takes, but she still worries about not being a conventional beauty.

Then the girl who had her first Hollywood apartment upholstered in a leopard skin pattern, who bought the wrong hats and who ironically described herself as "Shelley Winters of stage, screen, radio and Schwab's Drug Store," landed in Rome, Italy, on a moonlit night.

She'll never be the same again.

"Paris was wonderful and London was out of this world, but Italy was heaven!" she says. "I was a big wheel in Rome. The people in the streets called out 'bella, bella, blonde' when I went by. And how those Italian men treat women! I'll never wonder about Ingrid Bergman any more. American men flatter you and you're pleased. But these men do something for you—they build you up in your own estimation. They called me feminine. Imagine, me—why in Hollywood everyone thinks I am an ablebodied girl who can shift for herself. They're all that way—the whole Italian nation. Right off Vittorio da Sicca said he had a film for me and we arranged for him to send the script to Greg Bautzer, my attorney, for approval. That's why I may go right back there."

I said, "Of course Vittorio Gassmann would have nothing to do with it."

Shelley has a flood of superlatives when she talks about her latest acquisition whom you may have seen in Bitter Rice. She says, "He's the handsomest and the most aristocratic man I've ever known. The most brilliant actor. And he has more charm than anyone else in the world. He has a fine mind and a marvelous sense of humor. We clicked from the very first moment. And the way he puts things! I was really feeling low when we parted at the plane—I didn't want to leave any more than he wanted me to. But I tried to smile bravely as I waved good bye to show that I was a good sport—chin up—and all that sort of thing. So my first cable Vittorio sent me on arrival read, 'I found your last sad smile very encouraging.' Now what American man would word it like that, I ask you.

"When he'd come to take me driving the back of the car would be full of yellow roses. He had this gorgeous brand-new Daimler and one day we drove out into the country. Something went wrong suddenly—the thing simply would not budge. But he didn't show the slightest annoyance or irritability. He fussed with it a little, then lifted his eyebrows, smiled and said, 'You know, Italians aren't a bit mechanically minded, I think we'd better find someone to drive us back to the city."

When she talks about her Vittorio, Shelley is a different girl. You'd never think she was the forceful actress who tried to direct Behave Yourself and was in the dog-house with everyone concerned because of it. Or the dogged character who crossed a continent to ask for a part she knew she could do superbly. She's not the tom-boy who loves to tell about the seven hours it took her and Farley to drive from Stratford-on-Avon to London because they kept getting lost and when they'd ask directions from the natives couldn't understand a word anyone was saying. Or the back seat driver to whom Farley would turn over the wheel when he couldn't stand her continuous advice.

This is quite another girl—this girl who fell in love in Italy on a moonlit night. She's meek and adoring and if her romance survives the acid test of time and distance, she may suffer a complete transformation in character and temperament. So far, being in love has not cut down the speed of her appetite for life and people. But from where I sit, this looks like love.

THE END

(Continued from page 30) question I'd have to be a psychiatrist. But I've known her since she was a plump happy kid starring in the beloved Wizard Of Oz. Without being an expert, I would diagnose Judy's trouble as this:

She is an overstimulated girl. Unlike other hard working actresses of Hollywood she could not shake off the excitement of her work and relax when she left the studio. Judy was always "on".

When she was still a little girl she sought and attracted friends who were too sophisticated and worldly for her. They lived on excitement and jazz sessions and late hours.

Even worse for her, she went through a near tragic love affair with a married man at the unbelievably young age of 15. At a time when the average girl is just beginning to date and hold hands and "neck" a little, Judy was carrying a torch a mile high for a man who couldn't marry her.

In both her marriages Judy was wed to men as highly sensitive and emotional as she. Dave Rose, musician and composer of the lovely Holiday For Strings among other fine melodies, is a charming man, but when he was married to Judy his career was not as firmly established as it is now. He was as young and ambitious and as self-centered as Judy.

Her second husband, Vincente Minnelli, was more mature and understanding—in fact, he was almost a nurse to her in the last two years of their marriage. No one could have been more patient than Vince.

When their daughter, Liza, was born everyone hoped that Judy's emotional upheavals might be over. And they might have been if she had not started to take on weight as do many women following the birth of a child.

To meet the rigid demands of the camera for streamlined figures, Judy dieted and dieted and became so nervous she could neither sleep nor eat.

The eventual crack-up of her nerves and her marriage were inevitable. And, perhaps, that frightful headline, JUDY GARLAND ATTEMPTS SUICIDE AS MOVIE CONTRACT ENDS was inevitable also.

It looked like the skids. Everybody said it was a tragedy. Judy, at 27, was through. She couldn't get a job in Hollywood or Broadway so she went to Europe where they do not so quickly discard favorites.

INTO her life at this time came Sid Luft, ex-husband of Lynn Bari, handsome, well-groomed, witty and a born playboy. Luft was good for Judy in that he is gusty and masculine and lends a strong masculine shoulder for her to cry on.

But, in many ways he is just as wrong for her as the other men in her life had been. He's too much of a stay-up-late boy, a "Let's go somewhere and do something" lad to be the perfect companion for a girl like Judy even after she hit the comeback trail.

Judy did not finish her performance at the Palace until nearly midnight but it was a nightly event for the cafe set to spot Judy and Luft arriving at El Morocco or the Stork at three or four in the morning as most of the owls were heading home.

"I'm not saying this is all due to Sid's influence. I know Judy well enough to believe that she could well be the one to say, "Let's go, go, go—" because she still can't sleep at night and her nerves are raw.

Yes, in spite of her stage comeback—well-loved little Judy is still a long way from being out of the woods—a tragic, lonely little figure who apparently cannot yet help herself nor be helped.

Robert Walker never thought that Hollywood was responsible for his unhappiness or for any of the troubles that beset him—even to his collapse and the five months recuperation in Menninger's Clinic which followed.

Bob would insist that he would have been a mixed up and neurotic person no matter what career he had followed or whom he had married. I can't go along with that. To me, the sensitive, repressed, emotionally taut Walker is one of the real heartbreak stories of Hollywood.

He might have weathered everything—perhaps to the point of being a completely happy person—and still have been able to stand up under the gaff, had he been thrown into a less turbulent world; and if the only woman he ever really loved had been a less beautiful, complicated and ambitious person than Jennifer Jones.

Bob used to say to his intimates, "It's wrong to blame Phyllis (he always referred to Jennifer by her real name). I gave her many bad times long before we ever came to Hollywood when we were still struggling on Broadway with two little boys to support."

This tendency to blame himself for everything, to make himself suffer in the eyes of others as he suffered in his own, was the most dangerous neurosis by which young Walker was plagued.

He was constantly belittling his work even to telling director Leo McCarey that he could not do justice to the "big scene" in My Son John and that the speech should be given to Helen Hayes, his co-star.

McCarey scoffed at what he believed was Bob's false modesty. Walker was reading the speech, "boning up" on it as he called it, night and day, without sleep, his nerves at the breaking point when the torrent finally burst.

He literally "went crazy" hitting walls with his bare fists, breaking everything he could put his hands on before his doctors admistered the sedative which had always calmed him in the past but which this time proved fatal. Poor Bob had demonstrated his last inner revolt against a career he was neither emotionally nor physically geared to handle.

FRANCHOT Tone is a tragedy of Hollywood because he has permitted the worst influences of the shabbiest fringes of this industry to change his personality. He came here a gentleman, a cultured intellectual man, a graduate of Cornell with a fine family background.

For years he stood for all that is circumspect and proper. Even when Franchot and Joan Crawford ended their marriage it was done with as much dignity as is ever achieved in a divorce.

When his marriage to blonde Jean Wallace began to go on the rocks it was Franchot who rated most of the sympathy and who seemed to be the "solid" foundation for their two little boys.

And then Barbara Payton entered the picture—a woman who seemed to exert an almost hypnotic influence over him and with whom he fell madly in love—and madly is the word.

I know that Franchot tried to break with Barbara several times before that unsavory brawl with Tom Neal which landed him in the hospital and all three of them in disgusting headlines. I know he tried to keep away from her because—before he left New York for the Coast two days before that fateful brawl, he called my office asking that we print a story that he had no intention of seeing Barbara while he was here fighting for the custody of his boys.

Did he keep that promise? He did not. Barbara called him at his hotel a few hours after he arrived in town and he was completely under her spell again—and on his way to a beating that seems to have permanently changed the refined appearance of the Franchot we used to know.

His merry-go-round marriage to Barbara and his subsequent brawl with a newspaper woman (she claimed he spat in her face) are events at the other end of the rope from the things Franchot Tone has always stood for in this industry.

Florabel Muir, the writer who made the charges that Franchot spit on her and kicked her, claimed that his speech was rambling and incoherent and there was a dazed look in his eyes. He was given a narcotics test, and after a medical examination it was proved that Franchot was not under the influence of drugs as had been claimed. But, years and years ago, back in the early days of the films there was no doubt that dope had ended the career of one of the greatest stars the screen has ever known—the handsome and irrespressible Wallace Reid.

Even though Wally has been dead for nearly 30 years, the memory of him has not died. If ever there was a young Greek god in modern clothes it was this wonderful-looking man who was the idol of a nation in his clean sports-inspired films.

Yet at 32, Wally Reid was dead, victim of a habit he fell prey to because of overwork. Stars today feel they are imposed on if they make three films a year.

Wally made eight movies a year—that is how great his popularity was. But it took an enormous toll on his strength and nervous energy. He started taking drugs at first to "pep him up" so he could fulfill the demands his popularity made on him. As always happens—he became the slave, not the master, of the narcotics that he felt were so necessary.

Because he was known and loved as an athlete, Wally took dope through the soles of his feet and through his gums so as not to mar his muscular arms. Toward the last years of his life when he was hopelessly addicted, his teeth fell out from too many thrusts of the narcotics needle, and this young man had a face as sunken as an old man of 80 unless he was wearing his false teeth.

Dorothy Reid, his gallant wife who stood by him through thick and thin, did everything in her power to combat the drug evil which had claimed him and put some of Wally's insurance money in an anti-dope film. But to this day, Wally Reid remains in memory as one of the most tragic figures ever to fall from the heights in Hollywood.

Four beautiful women—"too beautiful" women, have been great tragedies in Hollywood. I mean, Carole Landis, Jean Harlow, Barbara Lamarr and Lupe Velez.

I believe that all of them sought more from fame than fame was ever to give them. Strangely enough, all these great beauties sought security and foundations in their careers—the two things which were to be denied all of them. Nor were they ever to know the comfort of sincere love.

Jean Harlow, the glorious platinum blonde, has never been equalled for the sexy brand of glamor she had on the screen.

Yet her personal life was a series of tragedies and frustrations including a teenage divorce, the suicide of her second husband, Paul Bern, a short-lived marriage to cameraman Hal Rosson, and then a love affair which nearly broke her heart.

Jean was loved by many men but she loved only William Powell. She died suddenly of a kidney infection at the young age of 26 soon after she and Bill had broken up following a quarrel. I do not believe Bill has ever gotten over the heartache of the beautiful girl who loved him too deeply. Bill didn't want to marry anyone and Jean wanted to marry him more than anything in the world.

Lupe Velez, the fiery, laughing little Mexican girl, is another who never found happiness in Hollywood in spite of the great happiness fans found in Lupe. Lupe was constantly in love, her greatest love being Gary Cooper.

But the most tragic of all was her last love, the man she killed herself over when she found she was going to bear his child and he would not marry her. Under an empty bottle of sleeping pills which she had taken to end her life, Lupe left the pitiful note:

"May God forgive you and forgive me, too. But I prefer to take my life away and our baby's, too, before I bring him shame or kill him. How could you fake such great love for me and our baby when all the time you didn't want us? I see no other way out. Lupe.

BARBARA Lamarr was a victim of her own beauty. Alone in the world and thrust out into the world far too young in life, Barbara was only 17 when she was brought up before a Los Angeles Judge because of the company and the late hours she, a minor, was keeping. The lovely young face in front of him touched the magistrate. He spoke kindly, but prophetically, when he said:

"My dear, you are too beautiful for your own good!"

A group of Hollywood people were discussing the problem of reviews, and of what to tell the producer of the movie when it obviously isn't a hit. An eye-witness then reported how Greta Garbo had avoided expressing like or dislike for a Goldwyn picture she'd seen at a preview attended also by the producer. When the lights went up, she approached Goldwyn who was eager to hear her words of approval, while she was determined to be non committal. "Sam," were her words, which satisfied them both, "there is only one Goldwyn."

Leonard Lyons in
The New York Post

Barbara, with her hair as black as a raven's-wing, her jewel-like green eyes and satin white skin, went on to be the glamor girl of her day in Ramon Novarro pictures and under the directorial guidance of Rex Ingram. But, as the Judge had predicted, her beauty was too much for her. There were too many men in her life, too much excitement and too little reality.

The gorgeous Lamarr was her own worst enemy and like these other great beauties I have mentioned, she died young. She made the fatal mistake of settling for the tinsel of fame and fortune and of burning the candle at both ends. But so great was Barbara's loveliness that I can only quote Edna St. Vincent Millay's lines about the lady who burned a candle at both ends, "It gave a lovely light"—while it lasted for this really beautiful woman.

Carole Landis, the beautiful blonde with the magnificent figure who took her life a bare five years ago, is another tragic figure of a wrecked career.

Hers is a "different" story from most of the beauties. Carole sought Hollywood not for its glitter and excitement. She sought stability and an anchor in Hollywood.

Early in life she was out on her own. She traveled around taking jobs here and there that would pay her a bare living and for the trimmings, well, there was always money—spending escorts for beautiful girls and the world she lived in was giddy and careless.

But Carole was different from other butterflies. She was intelligent and she wanted more from life than a good time and nonsense. While she was still living in San Francisco she was an avid reader of fan magazines and the stories that attracted her most were those about the home life of movie stars and their "normal" life.

So Carole came to Hollywood—and she was among the few in the thousands of girls who wanted to achieve stardom. She became a star, and Hollywood gave her everything but what she sought, security. Sometimes she thought she had found it, particularly after she married wealthy Horace Schmidlapp and had her own beautiful home in Bel Air.

But it wasn't to work out that way. Fate willed it that her career, which had been so bright for a few years, began to hit the skids just about the time her marriage went on the rocks.

Her money was going fast, few jobs were in sight and an unhappy romantic interlude with Rex Harrison proved to hold too much bitterness for the girl who had expected so much—too much—of fame. On July 4th, 1946, Carole Landis was found dead in the bathroom of her home, a pitiful martyr to the happiness she had sought in vain in "home loving" movieland.

The stories of the other three stars who round out my greatest tragedies of Hollywood are too well known (except to the youngest of fans, perhaps) to need much detailing. I refer to gamin, lovable little Mable Normand, to Rudy Valentino and to John Gilbert.

Mabel and Rudy are now fables of our town and are part of screen history. Recently you fans discovered a new young idol when Tony Dexter brought the Valentino Story to the screen. Through Tony's portrayal you learned much, not all (they changed many events in the script) of Valentino's flaming short career. This flashing young Italian with the smouldering eyes was loved and adored by women except, as he once told me, "the women I love, don't love me."

SOON Paramount is bringing the story of Mabel Normand to the screen and we will relive again the sunny first part of Mabel's story when she was a madcap star of Mack Sennett comedies. And if the scriptwriters are honest, they will bring us through the black, black days of the end of her career following the time she figured in the sensational William Desmond Taylor murder investigation and on to her death, a drug addict.

As for John Gilbert—I believe his story, too, will some day be put on the screen. He was never surpassed as a star of violently passionate and romantic stories, and his ill-fated love affair with Greta Garbo has gone down in the books as one of the most glowing of Hollywood history.

It was not a woman, however, that really broke Jack's heart. It was a mechanical contrivance called a microphone, "the talking screen" that broke the spirit of this dashing actor. He never recovered from cruelly frank reviews that the great lover of the silent screen had a "thin, high pitched, effeminate speaking voice" over the new sound tracts.

Well, there they are—my most tragic figures of Hollywood. Let us think of them kindly—those that have gone on. Let us think of those who still have a chance to come out of it, hopefully. For, one and all, they have given us wonderful moments of glamor and excitement in their screen portrayals.

"That was silly, wasn't it?" Liz agreed. "Would it have cost much?"

It would have cost a small fortune, but the man didn't tell her. He just muttered quietly to himself about women who had no regard for money. It was a far cry from the little girl of two years ago who had been thrifty with her small allowance.

The point of all this is that Elizabeth Taylor has probably made the most astonishing progress in growing up in the history of Hollywood. She is, at 19, a complete sophisticate, a divorcee, and well on her way to becoming the femme fatale people expected she would be by the time she reached 30.

When Elizabeth Taylor arrived in New York City and decided to stay awhile before heading for Hollywood, a romantic charade that would have done credit to Lola Montez began. And the little girl who thought she was getting too involved with men because she had been engaged twice was the center of it all.

At first there was Nicky Hilton. Liz took a flying trip to Texas to see Nicky. According to published statements, she went to talk over property settlements —something that any good lawyer will tell you was settled finally before she went into court. Then Nick came to New York. Nothing romantic, the newspapers said, just a visit to talk over a few details in the property settlement. Then, together, Liz and Nicky drove up to Richfield, Connecticut and spent the week-end with relatives —again to talk over property settlement. People who saw them on that latter trip say it was the cosiest legal huddle ever beheld.

When Nicky left for Texas again, Liz was terribly lonely—for about five minutes. Then the phone rang and it was Montgomery Clift. He came right over and was her constant companion until she checked out of the Savoy Plaza to fly to Hollywood. But Liz didn't go to Hollywood. She just went down the street and checked into the St. Regis Hotel. Michael Wilding checked into the same hotel from London the same day. Intersperse in this set-up the person of a handsome young band singer named Merv Griffin and you have quite a passel of romance.

This writer happened to be in New York at the time and was fascinated with the newspaper accounts of the affair. He called Liz and recorded certain statements and observations which he sets down here.

The first observation is that Elizabeth Taylor is entirely finished with being a child. There is nothing in her voice or manner that remotely suggests adolescence. Her high-pitched tremor that was something of a trademark is gone. Her voice is low and her speech precise. There is no uncertainty in her opinions, as there was two years ago. Despite the fact that she is quite a lady with the lads, there is no cockiness in her conversation about men—and there would be if she were still a kid.

"I would like," I said, "to talk to you about romance."

"Oh, please no," said Liz.

"But it's what everyone wants to read about," I said.

"I don't believe it," said Liz. "Most of the things that are printed about me and men are untrue and so unreal. And besides, people are getting tired of hearing about it."

"They're not," I told her. "You're a beautiful woman and you have so many men crazy about you that the public wants to know every move you make romantically."

"But why?" asked Elizabeth. "I'm only 19. I've been engaged once (Liz doesn't consider her time with Glenn Davis an engagement) and I've been married and divorced—something I'm not at all proud of—WHY are they so particularly interested in me?"

"Maybe it's because of the kind of men," I said. "Take Montgomery Clift for instance."

"Monty and I are just dear friends," Liz said. "We're crazy about each other—but it's just a friendly crazy."

There wasn't enough conviction in her voice to sell me.

"How about Michael Wilding?" I asked.

"Michael and I are just good friends, too," Liz said. "We've known each other for years."

"And some people tell me," I said, "that you might remarry Nicky."

"That you can be sure won't happen," Liz said determinedly. "That is all in the past. We will never marry again."

One, two, three. Down went the men in Liz's life at the moment. All just good friends—and one, an ex-husband, who was not going to get back into her heart.

I couldn't help but think back to that interview two years before.

"What I want more than anything in the world," Liz had said that day, "is to meet some nice man when I grow up and marry him and raise a family."

"I'm afraid," I had answered, "your life is not destined to be that simple. You are going to have many great and important men in love with you—and your only problem will be whether or not you will be able to handle them and yourself."

It was pretty paternal, and she took it that way.

"I hope you're not right," she had said. "And I don't think you are. Why right now I don't know a single boy I like well enough to date regularly."

The very next day she met Nicky Hilton —and married him three months later.

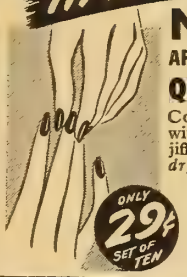
I observed during my talk with Elizabeth Taylor in New York that she had progressed career-wise, too. We spoke of the fact that her contract with MGM would be up in a year and she could be a free agent if she chose.

"Of course," Elizabeth said, "the decision as to whether I sign or not is not entirely up to me. But I want to do a lot of things that a contract actress is not able to do. I want to appear in a play on Broadway. I want to make pictures in Hollywood, but I also want to make them in Europe. I want to advance as an actress and do everything an actress can do."

"You're already handling your own affairs, aren't you?" I asked.

"Yes," she said. "Almost all of them."

"And I heard you were going to buy a home of your own on the coast," I said.



"I might sometime," Liz said. "But for the present I'll keep my apartment. I have a lease," she said as an afterthought.

All in all, Elizabeth Taylor's life and outlook have changed. She is still earnest in her ideals and anxious to improve herself continually. It seemed to me that she still has no desire to be a modern day vamp, but she is, without question, involved in a romantic triangle that might enmesh her and spoil everything.

If an outsider were to select a mate for her from among the three major men in her life, he would, if he chose wisely, pick Montgomery Clift. To see them together is to see a beautiful couple.

The romance between Monty and Liz began during the making of A Place In The Sun. Although Liz was being courted by Nicky Hilton at the time, those close to her knew that she was quite taken with the quiet, scholarly Monty. And the workers on the set thought, although they didn't voice their opinions, that the love scenes between Liz and Monty were torrid mainly because they both enjoyed them so much. This is not intended to imply that Liz was fickle when she was going with Nick. Kissing on the screen is kissing, after all, and if it can be enjoyed by the screen lovers involved it lends reality to the picture.

Monty liked Liz, but he was too busy working to pay any real attention to her while the movie was being made. When the cast was waiting around to learn what added scenes would be needed, though, he spent a good deal of loafing time in her company. Maybe then he would have liked dating her with romantic intentions, but by that time Liz's wedding to Nicky was almost at hand.

There is something more than just casual dating between them now, because they make concessions to one another that they will not make for anyone else. Monty prefers to spend quiet evenings in the company of old cronies and if a cafe is visited, it is certain to be one of the small, out-of-the-way spots that stud New York's East Side. Monty hates the pretentious places. Liz hates the "dives" but when she dates Monty she goes to these places with him and becomes a regular member of his gang.

On the other hand, in the period of a month, Monty took Liz to such chi-chi spots as The Maisonnette Room of the St. Regis Hotel and to other fashionable night spots where a beauty belongs. On these occasions he conducted himself like a real man of the world and mixed with Liz's friends grandly.

If they were not very fond of one another, neither would step out of his niche for the other. Add that to the fact that there is a good deal of affection showing when they are together in public—and Monty is a retiring man—and you have a fair case of young love.

Michael Wilding has been called "old enough to be Liz's father," but Cupid doesn't seem to care about that. No matter how much it is denied by either one of them, it is true that a love-type association exists between Michael and Liz. How deep the affection is, no one but Michael knows. As for Liz, she is fascinated by the elegant Englishman. His influence over her is almost along the Svengali order. When he snaps his fingers, Liz, they say, answers and runs to his side.

When Michael Wilding came to New York, Liz dropped Monty like a hot potato for the moment and, using the excuse that she was going back to the Coast, moved to the St. Regis. Although she denies that the interest involves romance, it is all too obvious when she is with him in public that this is not so. She glows. And they, too, make a handsome couple. They have in common, too, the fact that they both like the same things—and ignore the cost. They like to dress for dinner and they enjoy the subtle small talk of the English club set. They like swank. They like to travel. The only bug in the affair is that Michael won't be free to marry for a time.

Just how that romance will come out is a matter for sound thought because it is also a point of a triangle. It is hard to believe, but the other person involved is Marlene Deitrich. Not that Marlene is difficult to visualize as competition—it simply appears incongruous to think of both Marlene and Liz vying for the same man.

Just how Nicky Hilton figures in Liz Taylor's life is also difficult to figure. Liz is no doubt sincere in her statement—and belief—that she will not go back to Nick, but it can not be denied that she finds more than casual enjoyment in his company. Generally, when a man and woman separate in Hollywood they are not too friendly, despite the tales you have heard otherwise. Liz is fond of Nick and makes no bones about it. When she dated him in New York she was very affectionate and people who saw them in Connecticut say they were like a couple of happy kids on a holiday. And at about the same time, the Gotham papers carried a picture of Liz dancing with Connie Hilton, Nick's dad, at a gay party. There is no animosity between Liz and Nick, to say the least. Although Nicky announced his engagement to Betsy Von Furstenburg shortly before he rendezvoused with Liz in New York, it was stated in the inner circles of cafe society that he still carried a torch for his wife—and would go to some lengths to straighten things out. If he doesn't, it will not be because he didn't try. He is solid in the trio of favorite men and logical contenders for Liz' heart.

It's unfortunate that Liz can't have her wish about the magazines and papers forgetting her romantic life, but that would be impossible. Maybe the probing into her private life is necessary because, like most people in the public eye, Liz Taylor will not tell all the facts. Like her sisters in the films she may feel that it is all her business, and that evasion will serve her best. But in every interview, no matter how careful the star is, there comes a moment when something is said that may be a slip—and that may give the whole thing away.

When we had finished talking, and were about to say goodbye, I dropped the impersonal manner of the reporter.

"All right, Liz," I said. "You say they are only friends. Now don't cross me up and marry one of them before this story appears on the newsstands, will you?"

"When will it appear?" she asked.

"In the February issue," I said.

"Oh," Liz said—and there was a silence, a long silence. "My divorce," she said, "is final in January."

Three men are Liz's very own, they say, if she wants them. She could marry one of them in January. Will she? And which one? THE END

(Elizabeth Taylor will soon be seen in MGM's Ivanhoe.—Ed.)

"nice girls don't wear lipstick"

(Continued from page 58) that she was bringing up her daughter not only intelligently but considerately. And she could prove it . . . or seemed to. Yet, as I analyze it now, she was wrong, and whatever her reasoning, I suffered socially.

She held that I had been born with a good complexion and nothing that came in a tube, bottle or box was going to improve it. Again and again she would swing me around to face her big mirror and there would be the following speech:

"Look! Look at that light, creamy skin and the blush on the cheeks. That blush is what women are trying for with their rouge, but they only get an imitation of what you have. Your eyes are a nice blue, you have never had a pimple or a rash so many youngsters suffer from. And do you mean to say that you want to smear a whole drugstore across that nice face and spoil it?"

She would never admit that she had made me wear my hair in curls past the proper age for it. She defended this policy by pointing out that I was small for a girl of 13 and why dress older than I looked? And as for my wardrobe, it didn't hurt me a bit not to go in for the prevailing fads. It merely gave me an air of individuality which was certainly a nice thing for a young girl, wasn't it?

I suppose that a million youngsters have miserably tried to cope with this sort of logic, logic which I now know to be both true and false at the same time. The fact remained that for all of mother's arguments I was feeling inferior at school. Whether I needed makeup or not, using it was part of the business of growing up at that time. The girls didn't talk history or geography when we got together. They talked makeup and parties and boys. Good skin or not, my face felt bare and over me hung a sort of stigma. When it came to my curls, being small was all the more reason for trying to look older, the way I felt about it. And as for being a girl with individuality, I don't have to explain how thin is the line that kids draw about this. You can be distinctive in some ways but you've got to go along with the crowd in a general way. Mother wasn't making me an individual, and I was just mother's girl—and not only looked it, but felt it. When, a year after I left high school, Mother died suddenly, I was still her girl. It was hard then to face the world as I would have to—an incomplete self. From that day, to the day I overcame this handicap in New York, my main job, you might say, was to regenerate what was missing.

Yes, when I was in school, it was wonderful to have a mother who could go down to the Dayton Company store or Harold's or Bjorkman's, take one look at the latest Paris imports, and copy them at home for her daughter. But this didn't help me when all the other kids were wearing sloppy joe sweaters and dirty saddle shoes or squeaky huaraches. They got something out of this that I didn't get out of my starched collars and neat pleats. I had outfits enough so I could wear something new every day for three weeks while the other girls had only twice-a-week changes, but there was something more important . . . I couldn't sport the something extra that might happen to be the current rage, so despite all my clothes I felt "out of things."

With their makeup talk and their boy talk and their party talk, the other girls got so much out of their school years that school itself was almost incidental. I just got school. If these happen to be the kind of things that count with youngsters, then I think they were important, and any youngster who acts as if they aren't is only pretending. I know . . . because I pretended. I pretended I didn't care whether I was liked or not. I pretended that I didn't care about boys. I pretended I was happy living my way. If I could have explained all this to Mother I think she would have understood, but the trouble was that I didn't understand myself what was wrong with me half the time.

There were other girls whose mothers were strict with them, even stricter than mine, and some of these undertook to lighten their situation in a much different way. They were the kids who would head for the washrooms the moment they hit school where they would really slap on the makeup. The results weren't always good because in their defiance they overdid it. But somewhere in between no makeup and over makeup was the proper handling of this problem if they and their mothers could have gotten together.

I wasn't altogether spineless in the makeup question. I remember, when I was 15, standing at the cosmetic counter in a Minneapolis department store and dubiously studying a mild colored lipstick which I held in my hand. She leaned over the counter. "That one," she said, with a significant edge to her voice, "doesn't look like much in the stick but it changes to bright rose when it goes on."

My mouth dropped open and I stared at her. "No kidding," she went on, nodding her head. "It becomes real snappy on your lips." That was enough. I looked around, spied my mother at another counter not far away, and ran to her swiftly.

In my mind was a wild plan (wild for me). When Mother saw this pale stuff I held, which hardly looked darker than a lip pomade, she might consider indulgently that it was harmless enough to let me get it. Afterwards, of course, she would be bound to notice it and see that it was more vivid than she had supposed. But by then a precedent would have been set. Okay, so I would compromise and agree to wear a more subdued shade . . . but I would be wearing lipstick!

I got away with this, and it was only the third victory in my fight against Mother's edicts about my girlhood. That I was already dusting my nose faintly with powder was only because on my 14th birthday an aunt had given me a compact and Mother couldn't bring herself to nullify the present by not letting me use it. And just six months before that, yes, not until I was midway through my thirteenth year, had I been able, finally, to put an end to wearing my hair in long curls—with bows in them, naturally. If you don't think that hadn't been a trial!

Even my father sensed how I felt about it. Some time after my thirteenth birthday, I was invited to a party and I threw a tantrum about going in my curls. "It's too silly!" I wept. "There'll be younger girls than me there with their hair combed out. How do you suppose that will make me look?"

Mother wouldn't budge, and I was announcing broken-heartedly for the tenth time that I wasn't going when Dad shot me a certain "look." I knew it to be the kind that meant something interesting might happen if I would shut up. I did, with an inner security that my problem was solved. Dad was to drive me to the party. After he had gone some way from the house, he took a comb from his pocket and handed it to me. I pulled the ribbons from my hair, combed it out, and he put the ribbons in his pocket.

ON the day I graduated from Washburn High School in Minneapolis I received a lot of congratulations because I was salutatorian of my class with a record of A-minus for the term. But my biggest kick came not from being salutatorian, but from the knowledge that for the first time in my life I was wearing mascara on my eyelashes. Just a touch. Mother had supervised, had practically applied it herself, to tell the truth. But it was there.

Despite the fact that I practically had the rating of teacher's pet in school, and had never been one of the gang (the closest I came was when I was caught chewing gum in class and had to wear a wad of it on the end of my nose till the period was over), the kids voted me two awards in the yearbook: the girl with the most beautiful skin and the girl most likely to succeed. Mother saw it, naturally, and waved it at me as documentary proof, so to speak, that she had been right all along.

"They passed up the complexions of the girls you told me about, I notice," she said. "The ones who wore dark lipstick and rouge and bright nail polish. And as for the ones who were always talking to boys and going to house parties—you're the one they think will succeed, not them."

I was happy for Mother's sake. It hadn't been easy for her to stick to her guns through tears and tantrums and rebellions. I shall always admire her for this. But in my heart I couldn't agree with her. Maybe success was ahead of me. I don't think I was too concerned right then. All I felt was that up to that moment, in youth's business of trying its wings until there's the glow and confidence of coming strength, all those laughing, gay kids about me had already succeeded!

I felt this even more keenly when I left Minneapolis for radio work in Chicago. It is revealing, I think, that I began to pay a great deal of attention to makeup; I depended on it as a distinct personality aid. I might not feel I was the woman I should be, but I was determined to look like her. You see, for me, perhaps because I had been deprived of it for so long, makeup had taken on an unusual significance. And it was then that I practically set my "style" which I still follow today.

Yet, though all this helped, I was far from being a self-possessed young lady at all times. That sort of ease was still mine to attain. I was not silly, or giddy, but I was also without the ability to be just casually myself. A big six-foot-four hunk of football player from Northwestern proved it to me when he turned out to be my blind date one night. I felt woefully nothing beside him, even if I had grown up to be a tall girl by that time. But as it turned out, this same good-looking giant was to do wonders for my self-esteem.

We began to see a lot of each other and finally got so that neither was going out with anyone else. One evening we started out for what he had said would be a formal affair at the Medinah Temple. When we got there, I learned that his own parents, who were present, were giving the party, and before I could find out why, his father strode to the center of the room and announced our engagement!

Inasmuch as my blond-haired fullback had neglected to mention that he had selected me for his wife, I resented this in what I think was a normal feminine reaction. Not then, of course. He ran over to get me, we received congratulations, and it was only afterwards, when we were alone, that I told him "this can never be."

But at the same time, it was a compliment I fully appreciated. I felt like half a somebody anyway, and this good feeling went with me when I decided to move on to New York. Maybe it helped me to walk to the piano and sing that song at the cocktail party. I know my confidence in my appearance, the effectiveness of my makeup, was a source of great strength. And in that moment, and with that song, I became a whole somebody . . . at last!

The Strangest Honeymoon a Bride Ever Had!

Everyone called it a wonderful marriage. But their first night ended with Carl sleeping outside their nuptial chamber, while Christine trembled on her bridal bed before the first of many terrible truths she was to learn about the man she adored.

• Christine was to learn about Carl's strange ideas of love, which grew out of a warped adolescence; she was to learn about Carl's consuming passion for business success, although his department store job brought him more glory than money; and she was to learn the real reason why Carl needed her so desperately . . . a reason he never admitted until it was almost too late.

They both worked. But while Carl inched along with little raises and promotions, Christine made a fabulous success of a broken-down tea room, until her earnings far outstripped Carl's. She thought he was happy over her success . . . until she discovered that his "overtime" nights and weekends were being spent with a girl named Barbara . . .

You will never forget the explosive, shattering climax of "The Stranger Beside Me". This exciting new novel is yours to enjoy practically as a gift, if you accept this triple-sampling offer to new members of the Dollar Book Club.

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. My mother tells me she saw Joan Crawford in motion pictures 30 years ago at which time she was in love with a director named Woody Van Dyke. Is this true and with whom is Joan in love now?—E. D., New York, N. Y.

A. Joan Crawford made her motion picture debut in 1926. Her first film was directed by Woody Van Dyke. These two were never in love. At the moment of this writing, Joan has no particular love interest.

Q. Why did June Allyson change her name from Jan to June? Isn't it true that she's really 35 years old and once worked as Betty Hutton's understudy?
—C. T., Dover, Del.

A. Miss Allyson thought that Jan was too masculine a name. She changed it to June when she began to look for theatrical work on Broadway. The name-change apparently brought her good luck as she was hired to understudy Betty Hutton in Panama Hattie. June Allyson was born on October 7th, 1924.

Q. Is it true that Alan Ladd refuses to pose for pictures with his son by a first marriage? If it isn't, why don't we ever see such pictures in Modern Screen?
—K. F., Norwalk, Conn.

A. See Louella Parsons' Good News in this issue.

Q. I understand that Tony Curtis has developed a swelled head now that he's tasted a little fame. Is this on the level? —H. J., Topeka, Kan.

A. Curtis is still extremely cooperative with all members of the press. In some quarters his new-found self confidence is being misinterpreted as conceit. Actually, it is impossible to become successful in Hollywood without undergoing some very definite personality changes.

Q. Does Janet Leigh ever run into either of her two ex-husbands, and does she still deny they exist?
—T. Y., Merced, Cal.

A. Janet has never denied her two previous marriages, never has run into her two previous husbands.

Q. Is it true that child actresses last longer in the movies than child actors? If so, why is it?
—B. F., Louisville, Ky.

A. It's true largely because it is easier to find story material for young growing girls than for young growing boys. Latest child star to have his career threatened by adolescence is Claude Jarman, Jr.

Q. Why do so many stars hire press agents in January and February?
—U. O., Chicago, Ill.

A. The Academy Awards are given out in March.

Q. Does Betty Grable plan on having any more children?
——G. F., Medina, Tenn.

A. No.

Q. Is it true that Dale Robertson's mother gave him the family savings so that he could crash Hollywood. How much money does it take to crash the movie business?
—C. J., Oklahoma City, Okla.

A. Dale's mother gave him $10,000. His two aunts gave him another $10,000. There is no fixed sum necessary to crash Hollywood. One needs money to live on, however, before the lucky break comes.

Q. Before Harry James married Betty Grable, didn't he have two sons somewhere? Do these boys live in Hollywood? Who has custody of them?
—V. S., Dallas, Tex.

A. James' ex-wife, Mary Louise Tobin James has custody of both sons in El Paso, Texas.

Q. What is the truth about Ezio Pinza? Did MGM drop him because he fought with Lana Turner on the set of Mr. Imperium or because his pictures were terrible? —B. B., Atlanta, Ga.

A. Pinza's two films for Metro, Mr. Imperium and Strictly Dishonorable, were not box-office hits. Story material for Pinza is also difficult to obtain because of his age. Pinza was dropped for these reasons, no other.

The ever-glamorous Joan Crawford poses for the cameraman on the arm of escort Mel Dinelli at the premiere of Quo Vadis. Despite rumors, Joan has no romantic entanglements—she's much too busy.

Jeanne Crain and hubby Paul Brinkman are proof-positive that Hollywood marriages can—and do—flourish! Will it be a sister, or a new brother, for their three sons in February? They want a girl.

Ricardo and Georgianna Montalban, also at the premiere, expect another visit from Sir Stork soon. For the full story of how Ricardo met and married Georgie, see the April issue of MODERN SCREEN.

Deborah Kerr and Robert Taylor, stars of Quo Vadis, hold a reunion with the movie's director, Mervyn LeRoy, at the premiere. LeRoy has reason to be proud of them—both were hits in the film.

THE EX-MRS. SINATRA AND THE EX-MR. AVA GARDNER FINALLY MEET—WOW! . . . PAT NEAL AND GARY COOPER DECIDE TO

Would you like to read an eye-witness account of the first meeting between Nancy Sinatra (the former Mrs. Frank) and Artie Shaw (the former Mr. Ava Gardner) in New York?

My favorite New York spy writes the details.

"New Yorkers hadn't seen Nancy's NEW personality since her divorce from Frank," reports my friend, "and I must say she has become a dazzler, so petite, so chic and so sparkingly pretty."

Well, on this particular night, Nancy came into Gogi's La Rue with her friends from the Coast, the William Perlbergs. They were soon joined by Judy Garland and Sid Luft and then the whole party moved into the small private room, adjoining the main dining room, where Artie Shaw was sitting with his fiancee (?), the Dowling girl, and a columnist.

Apparently, Shaw had never before set eyes on the original Mrs. Sinatra because I overheard him ask the writer, "Who's the little beauty with the big brown eyes?"

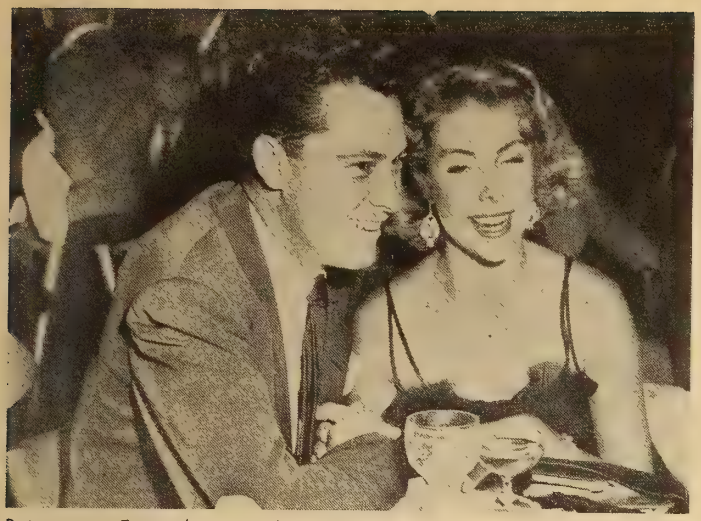
He was told it was Nancy Sinatra.

"What!" gasped Ava Gardner's second husband. "You mean he left THIS doll—and three children? He's gotta be crazy!"

My spy comments, "Everything considered, I think this is quite a commentary."

RITA Hayworth's suspension at Columbia lasted just five days. But they were five days of jitters for everyone concerned. Columbia had invested $500,000 in pre-production costs on Affair In Trinidad. And the minute she walked off the picture, Rita's $5000 weekly salary was stopped.

"She is very emotional and mixed up," said one of her friends, "The break-up of her marriage to Aly Khan took its toll of her self-confidence. Rita is a bundle of nerves and very unsure of herself."



I find that hard to believe. Rita had rehearsed two dance numbers for the film and they were wonderful. And she looks radiantly beautiful these days.

Could be she is getting a Greta Garbo complex.

Ever since her return to Hollywood she has shunned her old friends even to refusing to come to the telephone when they call. On the few occasions when she has accepted a social invitation she has been heard to remark that "people aren't nice to me."

Stuff and nonsense!

To Rita, once my good friend, I say as one who is still her friend: "Think straight and act wisely. Your leave of absence from Hollywood while being a 'Princess' did your career no good. But, don't, for heavens sake, be your OWN worst enemy."

Betsy von Furstenberg and Nicky Hilton (Liz Taylor's ex) spiked rumors that their on-again, off-again romance was off-again when they announced plans to marry in 1952. But the question is, will they?

Kirk Douglas gets a big laugh out of the pigtails that Elizabeth Threatt sports in The Big Sky. Elizabeth, whose middle name is Coyote (she's part Indian), has her first important role in this film.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

CALL IT OFF . . . TY AND LINDA WARM THEIR HOUSE WITH A PARTY . . . FARLEY GRANGER "DISCOVERS" HILDEGARDE NEFF

I WAS with Joan Bennett within an hour after the shocking news that Walter Wanger had shot her agent, Jennings Lang, in a jealous passion over Joan. I'm not going into a dissertation on the moral angles of this tragedy one way or another.

But I shall never forget Joan—distraught, completely beside herself, and shaking like a leaf. She couldn't sit down—just kept pacing the floor up and down, back and forth. She hardly seemed to hear the words of comfort given by her former husband, Gene Markey, who had dashed to her side, or from other friends present.

Over and over she kept repeating, "To think that I should be the one to bring this terrible scandal on Hollywood. I can't believe it. It's a terrible nightmare."

THE rain, that started that Saturday morning, poured and poured all day and was drenching all Southern California by nightfall, didn't dampen the enthusiasm of the lucky guests who had been invited to the housewarming of Linda and Tyrone Power.

Their new home is enchanting and the large colorful rooms were a perfect setting for Linda, vivid and flashing in a beautiful Fontana gown of green that almost matched her eyes and the emeralds she wore.

I hadn't any more than noticed this—than I spotted Joan Crawford in a gown that just matched her stunning Topaz jewelry. I filed it away for a little fashion note.

At dinner, I sat next to Michael Rennie and he and his Maggie are two of the most attractive Britishers who have ever settled in our town. They came with their neighbors and good friends, Fieldsie and Walter Lang.

Speaking of an attractive Englishman—Ronald Colman was there and he told me Benita had been, and was still, very ill with poison ivy. "And, don't you dare say she caught it from our HALLS OF IVY," he laughed.

Evie Johnson's new shorter than short hair cut was attracting attention and she told me it had been barbered by her ever lovin' husband, Van.

Valentina Cortesa and Richard Basehart, the new mama and papa, didn't stay long and hurried home to the thin, adorable, brand new bambino.

Far be it for me to say that the "highlight" of the evening was Shelley Winters introducing her new love, Italian actor Vittorio Gassmann, to her old love, Farley Granger—but it was quite a moment. Farl seemed to weather the blow without missing a heartbeat.

He told me he had been a house-guest of the Powers for a week. "They're calling me 'the man who came to dinner' and stayed a week," he grinned.

Alan Ladd is a busy star, but he's also one of Hollywood's most devoted family men. Here he dines out with three-quarters of his brood—(left to right) Laddie, his oldest son, 14; four-year-old David, wife Sue and daughter Alana. The Ladds also have a teen-age daughter.

Farley's date at the party was Hildegarde Neff and I think he likes the lady pulenty—but her heart is supposed to belong to Anatole Litvak, her favorite director.

Mrs. James Stewart, Merle Oberon, Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks Jr., Rocky Cooper, Mrs. Ray Milland, Claudette Colbert and Janet Gaynor Adrian were among the other beauties in gorgeous gowns getting their "pitchers took" by Bunny Waters Greene who was here, there and everyplace snapping the festivities with her camera.

CLOSE-UP of John Wayne: He has exactly the same close friends today when he is at the top of the heap as he did when he was just "old Duke," the cowpoke. His inseparable men companions are John Ford the director, and actor Ward Bond. . . . He likes his whiskey straight and his women shy and modest. If there's anything he hates it is a "conspicuous dame". . . . He doesn't like social affairs from big to small dinners. But he has been known to drop in on a friend, talk for hours, stay for dinner and then spend the night! Once, he dropped in on John Ford and stayed two weeks. . . . He doesn't want anyone to know it, but he is still a little bit shocked over women smoking. Particularly, women with gray hair. . . . Way back in grade school he learned some poems and he can still recite them. Robert Service, and his poems of Alaska, are his favorite reading matter. . . . He isn't startled by the success which has made him No. 1 man on the screen because it happened so gradually he "didn't notice anything". . . . He wouldn't live anywhere but California if you gave him a worldwide choice. His next favorite spot is Mexico. He loves the lazy people, the mañana attitude and the hot hot food. . . . He's kind of a lazy guy himself. . . . He's been in the Mocambo nightclub just once and he's never dined at Romanoff's. Now and then he'll venture out to some quiet little place and listen to a good piano player. . . . He's more like an older brother to his children—seems that he just can't discipline them, no matter how hard he tries to be firm! . . . All in all, he's a very good guy to be representing us as the top actor at the box office and the popularity polls.

ALL you girls who worry because you don't have a steady fellow probably won't believe this—but it's true. Luscious Marilyn Monroe, publicized as having more sex appeal than any movie star since Jean Harlow, didn't go to two pre-holiday parties because she had "no escort"!

Have you noticed that you never read about curvaceous Marilyn dining and dancing with this-one or that-one in the various nightclubs? As beautiful and alluring as she is—she is one of our real stay-at-home girls. And she admits it.

"Maybe I'm choosy," Marilyn told me. "I don't like to be going out just to be seen somewhere. But I won't lie—I'd like someone to come along who is nice, and a good dancer and fun to talk to—just like hundreds of other girls."

Before his death last year, Marilyn was devoted to her former agent, Johnny Hyde. Johnny made no secret that he wanted to marry her in spite of the difference in their ages (Johnny was 56 and Marilyn is 25). He did everything in his power to put her over as a star and she was always grateful to him. But she realized that gratitude was hardly the basis for a successful marriage.

When Johnny was taken very ill with a serious heart attack—and Marilyn was told by the doctors that he could not live—she let Johnny give her a diamond engagement ring because it made him so happy. Everyday she was a visitor to his bedside at the hospital. She made his last days very happy.

But surely, sometime, someone will come along who will bring "dates" and romancing and real love for this girl who says her career is "everything" to her. Is that fair for a belle who, obviously, was not designed for a bachelor-girl existence?

PURELY Personal: Shelley Winters has really given me the chill since (as she says) I haven't taken her big romance with Vittorio Gassmann seriously. The gal says what she feels for the Italian actor is the real thing and that she is going to marry him. Unfortunately, he has a wife which Shelley says he will shed—and Vittorio says he won't! . . . Since he started making love to luscious Liz Taylor, Michael Wilding wears his hair piece all the time—which is more than he did when he was making love to

Peggy Dow's dreams all came true the day she married her childhood sweetheart Walter Helmerich in an all white church wedding.

Peggy's wedding gown, fashioned mainly of heirloom lace that was in the family for many years, was designed by the bride herself.

Marlene Dietrich. . . . Esther Williams is on her way to becoming the Hetty Green of the screen. Where money is concerned—Esther knows the secrets. Everything she touches turns to cash and she's sure to clean up when she goes on tour with her Aquacade this Spring. Not since Sonja Henie, has any pretty girl shown more "cash" sense than the movie mermaid. . . . Kirk Douglas is becoming a cynical gent where the ladies are concerned. Methinks it will be a long, chilly time before Kirk gets around to marrying again.

THAT so beautiful redhead, Arlene Dahl, and her handsome groom, Lex Barker, invited their friends to their home for a Glade Jul party. Arlene, who comes of Scandinavian parentage, had all the smorgasbord, drinks and delicious things that go with such an elaborate fete.

The guests came early and stayed late. Ruth Roman and Mortimer Hall had a special celebration because it was their wedding anniversary. Pretty Georgianna Young Montalban, wife of the popular Ricardo, and Jeanne Crain were discussing babies. Both have dates with the stork, and it is the fourth child for each of them. These two girls are both beauties and believe in big families. I find that this is happening with quite a few Hollywood celebrities.

Farley Granger came all alone. Maybe he couldn't coax Hildegarde Neff to accompany him, or maybe he's just tired of women. Personally, I think Farl was hit a little harder than he'd like people to believe by Shelley Winters' desertion. Not that he wanted to marry Shell himself, but just another case of a dog-in-the-manger.

Anne Baxter was receiving congratulations on having been voted the most cooperative actress of the year by the Hollywood Women's Press Club.

That reminds me, Tyrone Power went on the air and really took the Press Club apart for naming the most uncooperative actors, saying it was of no interest to anyone except the disgruntled girls who voted. I wouldn't know, because I don't belong to the organization, but I was surprised to hear that Esther Williams had been named the most uncooperative actress. I have always found her to be just exactly the opposite.

Naturally I was not surprised that Frank Sinatra won the dubious honor of being named the least cooperative actor. The feud between Frankie and some of the fan magazines dates back a long time.

There are very few newspaper women in this club. Most of the members are fan magazine writers with a few press representatives among them.

THE two year romance of Pat Neal and Gary Cooper is over. Pat still loves Gary deeply, but she feels his ill health is caused by worry over his daughter, Maria, whom he adores.

Pat made a break two or three times, but always went back to Coop because he pleaded with her not to leave him. But she knows there's no chance for marriage because Gary's wife will never consent to giving him his freedom.

Personally I do not think Gary wants to do anything as drastic as getting a divorce himself because of Maria. There's no feeling for Rocky any more—that Gary has said. He admits that he loves Pat, but he would never let his own feeling interfere with anything that might be harmful to his beloved daughter Maria.

The Letter Box: V. Johnson, of Winthrop, Maine, is worried that Dan Dailey's new candid camera shots are revealing signs of fatigue again. "Please, please—tell Dan to take care of himself. He is my favorite star and we who love him cannot bear the thought that he might have to suffer through another breakdown."

"Just Stephanie," of Dallas, chides Hollywood producers. "How can they permit Olivia De Havilland to stay away so long? She is the greatest of screen actresses. Don't tell me there aren't good roles for her. She could have played The Blue Veil or Streetcar Named Desire or a half dozen other great parts. What's the matter?" Olivia's been touring with Candida, Stephanie, and she hasn't liked the films offered her.

"Clifford," Atlanta, Ga, thinks Farley Granger has broken Shelley Winters' heart and "that's the reason she acts so flighty—just to show him she doesn't care." Can't say that I agree with you, Cliff.

Well, that's all for now. See you next month!

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

How badly has the Joan Bennett-Walter Wanger-Jennings Lang mess hurt Hollywood? Not too badly, it's felt . . . As usual, everybody in Hollywood chose sides in the case, one of the worst scandals ever to rock Filmville. The sober-minded, however, realizing that calmness is the best course in time of panic, pointed out that the sins of a few shouldn't be placed on the doorsteps of all.

The Wangers

One of the most seriously affected when Miss Bennett's husband shot Lang in the belief that the agent was breaking up his home was Jane Wyman, who was visiting her friend Pam Lang, the agent's wife, at the time of the affray. Jane had been suffering from a serious kidney ailment, and friends said it was a nervous shock. But it doesn't appear that the publicity will affect Jane adversely . . . Joan, incidentally, had just finished her Christmas shopping when the shooting took place . . . Everybody was recalling how Joan had been named Mother-of-the-Year on a Mother's Day broadcast last year.

Metro is dusting off Forever, bought by the studio years ago for Norma Shearer but never produced, for June Allyson. It's about two lovers reunited in death . . . You'll see the old Ann Sheridan in Steel Town, with Howard Duff and John Lund. She plays a really tough babe, like she used to with Bogart and Cagney.

Turner

SEX APPEAL:

For Lana Turner's legs in The Merry Widow, MGM's wardrobe department turned out hand-made imported Belgian black hose worth $200 a pair . . . Sight of the month: Lana waiting outside his dressing room for Fernando Lamas to finish work in Widow every night! . . . But why didn't Lana list Turhan Bey among her amours in that magazine piece she wrote? He WAS one of them, as you'll no doubt recall . . . Do you think we'll EVER get used to calling her Lana Lamas? . . . Esther Williams accepted a beautiful orchid lei at the Cocoanut Grove and said, "I wish I could go around in just this!" And a man in the audience hollered, "Me, too!"

Ladd

You'll see Eleanor Parker wearing white silk tights opposite Stewart Granger in MGM's Scaramouche. But remember when she refused to make The Girl From Jones Beach (the part Virginia Mayo inherited at Warners) despite two perfectly good reasons? . . . Femme whistle department: Alan Ladd will play three bare-chested sequences in Shane . . . Total weight of the dozen gowns Denise Darcel wears in Young Man In A Hurry won't equal the weight of the ONE she wore in Westward The Women . . . Marilyn Maxwell was voted by Military Police at Point Mugu, Calif., as "The Girl We'd Most Like to Handcuff" . . . TV is showing its effect in Hollywood films. Wait till you lamp Angela Lansbury's cleavage in Mutiny—makes Faye Emerson look like a Camp-fire Girl!

Monroe

WHO'S MAD AT WHO:

Marilyn Monroe is boiling at a calendar company that exhumed an old photograph of herself in her birthday suit and used it on the 1952 calendars. Marilyn posed for it when she was broke a few years ago. And she can't sue because unfortunately she signed a release at the time . . . That (Continued on page 14)

"This 8-hour shower left me dry!"

"Again and again through the shooting of this picture, I was dripping wet. You know how drying that is to skin!" Happily, there was wonderful Jergens Lotion to use after every 'take'. There's no quicker way to restore softness to dry skin.

ESTHER WILLIAMS
co-star of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's
"SKIRTS AHOY!"
Color by Technicolor

"To get this comedy sequence, I was literally doused for hours." What a relief to smooth on soothing Jergens! It's so quick and easy to use—never leaves any sticky film.

A scene like this is worse for hands than mopping 20 kitchens. So see why Jergens helps so fast. Smooth one hand with Jergens Lotion — the other with any lotion or cream . . .

Then wet them. Water won't 'bead' on the hand smoothed with Jergens as it will with an oily care. No wonder stars prefer Jergens Lotion 7 to 1!

"For close-ups with co-star Barry Sullivan, my skin was smooth again." Jergens makes it easy to keep skin soft in spite of chores or chapping.

Keep your hands lovely. Use Jergens Lotion and see why it's used by more women than any other hand care in the world. 10¢ to $1.00, plus tax.

Monroe gal sure generates a lot of heat. She dated the entire Notre Dame football team when the pigskin lads were here . . . A tourist was snapping pictures at the Beverly Hills Hotel swimming pool. Hedy Lamarr was within camera range, sunning herself. She spoke up: "Please stop that. You are invading my privacy." Apparently mistaking her for a fellow tourist, the man said, "Look, lady, I'm just taking pictures. You wanna make something of it?" And Hedy covered her face with a towel! . . . Hedy, by the way, tells friends Hollywood is the only climate that agrees with her and she just has to stay here while hubby Ted Stauffer works in Mexico.

Lamarr

Just before she broke up with Farley Granger in favor of Vittorio Gassmann, it reached a point where Shelley Winters wasn't kissing Farl goodnight when he dropped her at her apartment after dates. They merely shook hands! . . . We've been to several Sunset Strip nightclubs lately on the same nights Shel's been on hand, and all we gotta say is we wish she'd quit snapping her gum while the floorshow's on! . . . And Farl doesn't know how close he came to losing the romantic lead in Danny Kaye's new picture, Hans Christian Andersen. Mrs. Sam Goldwyn, the producer's wife, has seen Henri Vidal, the big hunkaman who murdered femme audiences with his physique in Fabiola, and wanted Vidal for the part. But Sam was afraid Henri's thick French accent was too strong. So Farley won out.

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

I sat next to Ronnie Reagan and Nancy Davis at the Hollywood press agents' annual Panhandle Dinner. Ronnie kept up a steady stream of conversation on everything from Hollywood's public relations to what a pretty dress his date wore, and Nancy hung on every word he said. A truly devoted couple . . . Ronnie told me, "One of the things that gave Hollywood a black eye in its early days, aside from some of the scandals, was the publication of costs for making such pictures as Intolerance and Ben Hur. The innately thrifty American public read these figures, was shocked, and resented Hollywood" . . . Remember when Ronnie broke his leg and swore off baseball? Well, now he's starring in The Big League, a biography of baseball's Grover Cleveland Alexander, for Warners. Proving that for a buck you gotta change your mind!

Reagan

Vera-Ellen and Rock Hudson broke up, but neither shed a tear . . . And then alluva sudden Vera and Dick Anderson were a twosome! . . . Ginny Simms and Bob Calhoun may be wed by the time you read this. Their mothers have met and, to all accounts, approved. Bob—and this isn't generally known—is a former taxi driver who was left close to $1,000,000 by an aunt . . . The little invalid girl who came out from New Jersey to see her idol, Mario Lanza, wasn't interested in any of the movie stars she met or any of the events planned for her. All she wanted to do was be with Mario every minute, from six A.M. on—until she had to fly home . . . Mario's Because You're Mine set was closed to visitors while the child was here, and newspapermen were boiling about it. But MGM explained that the production department clamped down because the visitors had caused delays in shooting. "Mario has been wonderful," we were told, "devoting all his time to the little girl. He doesn't even eat lunch—just goes to his dressing room and relaxes and rehearses his songs—so there's little time for interviews" . . . When she finished Clash By Night at RKO, Barbara Stanwyck took off with pal Nancy Sinatra for a siesta in Palm Springs, came back much rested.

ODDS BODKINS:

Ironic, I thought, that Frank Sinatra gave Judy Garland such a genuine plug as "the greatest girl singer" on his television show. It was Judy's bow-out, remember, from the role of Julie in Show Boat that gave the part to Frankie's Ava. . . . No more talk about Rodgers and Hammerstein wanting to use little Judy in a stage musical. They probably figure she couldn't stand up under the strain of a long run. . . . The Garland family were all made up again as we went to press, following a falling-out. Judy birthday-gifted her mother, Mrs. Ethel Gilmore, with a huge basket of mums, jonquils and lilies-of-the-valley. And promised that her brother-in-law, Jack Cathcart (sister Sue's husband), will be her next musical conductor . . . La Gardner's new license number is prefaced by the letters FA, which stand for—you guessed it—Frankie and Ava. . . . Complimented on her beautiful figure, Ava said she won't have it long 'cause she wants a baby RIGHT AWAY!

Garland

Isn't it odd that Jimmy Durante is famous for his big nose, while Danny Thomas is famous in SPITE of his? . . . Judy Holliday and Annabella, Ty Power's ex, are lookalikes . . . I never realized Brod Crawford's southpaw till I saw him dialing a phone left-handed in The Mob. . . . They've put extra COPS on duty these nights at the drive-in theaters around Hollywood! . . . When U-I merged with Decca Records to make pictures, it was noted that the studio has only one singer under contract. Her name is Ann Blyth. This lot was un- (Continued on page 16) doubtedly become a major producer of musical films in which song stars will be built for Decca. . . . Spike Jones asked Margaret Truman to sing on his TV show. Don't laugh. Margaret worked with Spike and his City Slickers at the White House Correspondents' dinner. She was a hit, too!

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Scott Brady got a black eye working with Shelley Winters in Untamed. She turned suddenly in one of their sequences together, socked him accidentally with her head, and gave him a beautiful shiner. . . . Don Hartman is now head of production at Paramount but he was once an actor. He played the role of Andy Hardy on the stage in Skidding, the play that MGM bought and built into a series of pictures for Mickey Rooney. Well, Don is still a trifle actorish, although a nicer boss it would be hard to find in Hollywood. He met Vivian and Rosetta Duncan, the oldtime stage stars who came to a Para luncheon to wish Betty Hutton success in the film version of their stage musical, Topsy And Eva. Rosetta was introduced for the first time to Don, who asked pleasantly, "Are you going to do a little song and dance for us?" Rosetta looked him over and asked right back, "Why? Are you in charge of the music department here?"—hardly flattering to the man who holds the reins on pictures starring La Hutton, Alan Ladd, Bing Crosby and Bob Hope—but it brought giggles from the luncheon guests. . . . We're waiting with bated breath to see how Girl In White and stars June Allyson, Arthur Kennedy and Gary Merrill turn out. They're whispering around that director John Sturges had his hands full because Gary took his dialogue home every night and came back next day with his (or Bette's?) version of how it should be done; that Dick Powell was guiding June in her lines; and that Kennedy held out for HIS version!

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Marty Melcher gifted wifey Doris Day with a flowering peach tree for doing so well in I'll See You In My Dreams. She planted the tree in back of their Valley home. . . . Did you know that the dreamy Day's refusal to do "live" radio shows is costing her a fortune? She'll sing only on shows that are "taped" beforehand, so that if there are any mistakes they can be fixed before going on the air. Among the shows she has nixed is The Railroad Hour, with Gordon MacRae . . . Maureen O'Hara's brothers, Charles and James, have been crew-cut, Brooks-Brothered and de-brogued since their arrival from Eire, adventing American film careers for both goodlooking lads. . . . Jean Simmons has been over here quite a spell but still mails back food packages to her former hairdresser, wardrobe mistress, makeup girl and eight others in food-shy England. . . . I was on the set when the Simmons dreampuss was doing a love scene with Vic Mature for Androcles And The Lion. I asked her to comment on British versus American love-making. Said she: "Well, Vic is a bit eager and enthusiastic!" . . . June Allyson broke down and cried when her daughter Pam, three-and-a-half, had to go to nursery school. It suddenly made her realize that her child is growing up and really getting along in years.

Dinah Shore and George Montgomery observed their eighth wedding anniversary with a small dinner party at their Encino home. He's up to his neck with work in his furniture factory and Dinah's too busy with her new TV series for any special celebration. . . . When the Betty Hutton-Norman Krasna romance broke up 'twas whispered around Hollywood that it was because Norman wasn't exactly crazy about children, including Betty's. But the week before he married Erle Jolson, Al's widow, Erle adopted a five-month-old girl!

The Montgomerys

Dale Robertson planned a trip to Oklahoma, so that his wife, Jacqueline Wilson, could meet his many relatives. It takes a long time to meet all of the Robertsons, says Dale. And he and Jackie are expecting the stork this summer. . . . Ditto Ida Lupino and Howard Duff, although Ida has been told she must take it easy because of a spinal injury suffered in a fall some time ago. . . . While I was visiting the Famous set at Paramount, Bing Crosby proudly displayed a clipping from the San Jose Monitor that listed son Dennis as unanimous choice for the 1951 All-Catholic Prep Team in Northern California. . . . Vic Mature said, "If everybody will leave Dorothy and myself alone our marriage will be all right". . . . We cornered Glenn Ford at MODERN SCREEN'S Popularity Awards party at Ciro's but he had to tear himself away from the wonderful affair in order to pick up his wife, Eleanor Powell, at a Parent-Teachers meeting.

QUICK NOTES:

Did you notice that one newspaperman summed up Mickey Rooney's affection for tall girls by calling him "Mountain Climber Mickey Rooney"? . . . Keefe Brasselle, who used to sell shoes on Hollywood Boulevard, autographed a picture to his ex-boss: "Thanks to you, I got off on the right foot!" . . . Steve Cochran points out that the public has accepted blondes in movies as good girls. Back in the '30's and beyond they usually played "vamps." "But now," says Steve, who knows a good thing when he sees it, "look at Betty Grable, Doris Day, June Haver and Virginia Mayo!" . . . Milo Anderson, costume designer at Warners': "Jane Wyman, then a young starlet, decided to launch her social career in Hollywood with a very elegant cocktail party. We discussed the plans at great length. I promised to be on hand early, to give her moral support. I was. I walked into the living room

Dial Soap keeps complexions clearer by keeping skin cleaner!

Dial's AT-7 (hexachlorophene) removes blemish-spreading bacteria that other soaps leave on skin.

The cleaner your skin, the better your complexion. And mild, fragrant Dial with AT-7 gets your skin cleaner and clearer than any other kind of soap. It's as simple as that. Dial's bland beauty-cream lather gives you scrupulous cleanliness to overcome clogged pores and blackheads. You do far more than remove dirt and make-up when you wash thoroughly every day with Dial. Dial with AT-7 effectively clears skin of bacteria that often aggravate and spread pimples and surface blemishes. Skin doctors know this, and recommend Dial for both adults and adolescents.

Protect your complexion with fine, fragrant Dial Soap.

and could plainly see the pains she had taken to have everything perfect. Suddenly my eye was caught by large bowls crammed with brightly colored objects. It's Red Skelton's motto for the Red Cross: "Don't Drink That Pint—Give It!" . . . Fritz Lang, directing Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Ryan in a love scene for Clash By Night, told them: "Movie kissing is very complicated. You should remember all the rules but still kiss each other so that the audience will be satisfied!" . . . Helen Duryea cried her eyes out during the sad parts at the Chicago Calling preview. Later she said, "It's the first time in the 20 years Dan and I have been married that he ever made me cry!"... And this is Loretta Young's capsule but canny comment on fashions: "Your cover is the index to your contents."

ON THE FIRING LINE:

Leslie Caron received a fan letter from Leslie Caron! It wasn't conceit, but coincidence. The fan was Private First Class Leslie Caron, an artillery spotter with the 25th Division in Korea. . . . Sign of the times: There are 15 different war films playing in Los Angeles theaters. . . . His pal Danny Arnold was hospitalized when Jerry Lewis swung a golf club too vigorously and almost knocked Danny's left eye out. . . . Danny Kaye, since his return from the Korean battlefront, has been spending his time making phone calls to relatives of the GI's he met.

HE WENT THATAWAY:

MGM is getting an unexpected heehaw from audiences with a scene in Lone Star when Clark Gable, who has been palavering in an outdoor scene with a tribe of Indians, turns to his aide and yells, "Go pack my saddle bag, Geronimo!" Whereupon a little Indian kid comes out and packs it for him. It's supposed to be a dramatic scene but for some reason it's laughable. . . . Roy Rogers has made a million dollars during the last few years riding hither and yon, but he says that all he has left after taxes is $88,000. . . . Republic's Allan Lane has a colt by champ racer Reaping Reward, and will enter it at the Santa Anita track this year. . . . Guy ("Wild Bill Hickok") Madison and Gail Russell packed their bows and arrows and went boar hunting on Catalina Island. . . . The Warner Brothers are looking for a horse to play the part of Will Rogers' favorite, Soap Suds, in the late cowboy star's life story. Rogers' son, Will, Jr., is playing his father's role. . . . This is the bedtime prayer that Dana Andrews' six-year-old says: "God bless Mommy and Daddy and please make Gene Autry my uncle!" THE END

How to use a feminine syringe

"In my book mentioned below I have a number of suggestions about how and when to douche, sick care and feminine hygiene. One suggestion is that it's best to use a gravity-flow type of syringe as we do in the hospital, because its gentle action will not irritate delicate tissues. B. F. Goodrich syringes are available in several styles, regular fountain syringes, folding syringes and combination syringes. They all operate on the gravity-flow principle. The folding syringes are easy to use, and fold into a compact, water-proof travel kit that packs as easily as your toothbrush. All of these syringes have full 2 quart or more capacity."

picture of the month: the greatest show on earth

Cornel Wilde, aerialist and big box office draw, joins the circus as it leaves on tour. Circus ladies (like Dot Lamour) love him.

Circus boss Charlton Heston has his hands full trying to curb the dangerous rivalry that springs up between Wilde and Hutton.

Trying to top Betty, Cornel falls and ends his career. Betty decides to desert boyfriend Heston and become Cornel's wife.

A train wreck in the night brings out the heroism and loyalty that circus troupers have. It also resolves the tangled romances.

MOVIE REVIEWS

by Seymour Peck

■ Hurry, Hurry, Hurry! The circus has come to town—or rather Cecil B. DeMille's fabulous, fascinating movie about the circus, which is every bit as wonderful as the real thing. The Greatest Show On Earth parades before our dazzled eyes the whole gaudy, gorgeous galaxy of the big top—clowns and monkeys and bareback riders, daredevils and tigers, fat men and midgets, right down to the peanuts and popcorn. It is death-defying, breathtaking, funny, spectacular—and unforgettable as your first visit to the circus when you were only so big. Spending several months with the Ringling Bros.-Barnum & Bailey troupe in their winter headquarters at Sarasota, Florida, DeMille photographed in marvelous detail every aspect of circus life, from training and rehearsing, to loading onto trains for the tour across America, to setting up and performing in each new town. Against this bewitching background, The Greatest Show On Earth pictures the loves and conflicts and heartaches of trapeze artists Betty Hutton and Cornel Wilde, clown James Stewart, circus manager Charlton Heston, and showgirls Dorothy Lamour and Gloria Grahame. These players are all excellent, but the real star of The Greatest Show On Earth is the circus itself. Just the miraculous precision with which the circus workers raise the huge canvas tents under which the artists perform is alone more astonishing and awesome than any love story in Paramount's The Greatest Show On Earth.

DEATH OF A SALESMAN

Admired everywhere as one of the two or three great plays of our time, Arthur Miller's Death Of A Salesman has been brought to the screen magnificently—with all its emotional power and tragic sweep intact. A revelation of an average American workingman's anxieties, struggles, hopes and defeats, it is so true, so illuminating that it ties your stomach in knots, leaves you spent and limp—as though it were speaking to you of your own life, your own aspirations and failures. Yet Death Of A Salesman is not a totally dark and somber experience, for it soars with the beauty of its author's love and faith in mankind. Fredric March gives an intensely moving, impassioned, electric performance as the tired old salesman, Willy Loman, whose world cracks up with age, an inability to live by real values, and a bitter conflict with a son who once adored him. The way Willy Loman's shoulders stoop wearily under the weight of his sample cases, the way his face lights up with love and hope for his son and sags again with disappointment, are all conveyed heartbreakingly by March. As Willy's loyal, good wife, no actress could be better than Mildred Dunnock, who repeats her memorable stage portrayal. And an intelligent, fine-looking young stage actor, Kevin McCarthy, makes a sensitive screen debut as the son in rebellion against his father's standards. Death Of A Salesman may pain you, may make you weep—but you can't afford to miss it. It is too penetrating a portrait of modern life, and the way many of us live it.

THE MODEL AND THE MARRIAGE BROKER

Thelma Ritter, who very nearly stole A Letter To Three Wives and All About Eve away from their stars, is, at long last, a star herself. And The Model And The Marriage Broker gives Thelma a star-spangled opportunity to be funny, wisecracking, tough, tender and lovable all at once. Thelma's no beauty, and she's well over 21 but, like the great Marie Dressler, she radiates more down-to-earth, honest-to-goodness personality and character than a dozen younger, shapelier babes. The Model And The Marriage Broker is cut exactly to her pattern: as Mae Swazey, who makes her living in the delicate and slightly raffish business of finding mates for lonely hearts, Thelma can point up all the comic absurdities of the trade, while making us feel the pathos in the shy, reticent, sometimes homely, sometimes aging people who come to her, all wanting desperately the companionship that marriage affords. Jeanne Crain is a model who is sliding the wrong way into a relationship with a married man until Thelma steps in and decides to find Jeanne a good, wholesome—and single—man, without charge. Scott Brady is the good, wholesome single man and he and Jeanne go very attractively together. Nobody has ever made a movie before about this odd, precarious marriage broker business and, with Thelma to play it to the hilt, The Model And The Marriage Broker is a little different and a lot of fun. Cast: Jeanne Crain, Scott Brady, Thelma Ritter, Zero Mostel, Michael O'Shea.—20th Century-Fox.

FOR MEN ONLY

"Sleeper of the month" is this surprise picture, which plunges into the turbulent emotions of college students with an impact that has never been matched. Its motivation comes from the strangest sort of murder mystery ever filmed—the death of a dog during a fraternity hazing. Its love story is that of a medical professor (Paul Henreid) and his faithful wife (Margaret Field), whose ideal marriage is challenged by the powerhouse attractions of a Lana Turner-type student, played by Kathleen Hughes. There is not a dull moment from the time Robert Sherman, playing a fraternity pledge, turns tail and runs under the "supreme" test, until the college hero cracks up on the foundation of his psychopathic lies. An able supporting cast includes Bob Sherman (the most compelling eyes since Valentino), Russell Johnson (more sadistic than Kirk Douglas in The Champion), Jimmy Dobson and cute Vera Miles.

Cast: Paul Henreid, Margaret Field, Kathleen Hughes—Lippert Prod.

I'LL SEE YOU IN MY DREAMS

Too many movies about songwriters—from Cole Porter to George Gershwin to Rodgers and Hart—have given us a false image of these boys who knock themselves out rhyming June, moon, spoon and tune. Now at last, a very human and tuneful and refreshing musical sets the record straight: Songwriters are NOT all brilliant, unstable, tragic geniuses. Songwriters are not all great lovers. Songwriters do not all compose at 4 o'clock in the morning in a wild burst of inspiration after leaving Alexis Smith's penthouse. Telling the life story of Gus Kahn, whose lyrics grace some of the best songs of the last 35 years, this friendly, appealing movie shows Kahn as a plain, decent human being who works hard, loves salami sandwiches, marries and has kids, and enjoys giving his kids their bath—like all the rest of us. The only crises Kahn goes through are those the whole world goes through—a war, a depression, illness. Danny Thomas, as Kahn, is wonderfully likeable. He is perhaps a rough, homely guy and his speech isn't elegant. But he has more gentle, goodhearted humanity and warmth than a whole battalion of pretty boys. As his loyal, understanding wife, Doris Day has never been better—her singing is topnotch. Thomas and Day are naturals and with its down-to-earth good sense and good songs I'll See You In My Dreams is a natural, too.

Cast: Danny Thomas, Doris Day, Frank Lovejoy, Patrice Wymore.—Warners.

BOOTS MALONE

Boots Malone is the story of a lonely boy and a lonely man who find happiness and meaning in life through their friendship for one another. This friendship grows around a large racetrack where the boy, who is only 14, dreams of becoming an outstanding jockey, and the man trains him until he is good enough to achieve his dream. Written crisply and tersely, Boots Malone steers clear of the sentimental goo that usually fouls up stories of lonely little boys who fill an aching void in the lives of lonely, embittered men. Boots Malone works hard, and succeeds in capturing the proper balance of affection, manliness, straightforwardness and paternalism that may exist between a boy and man moving around a fairly hardboiled racetrack crowd. No conventional love stuff clutters up Boots Malone, either. It gets its color and drive and excitement from the hard, rigorous way the man shapes the boy into a prize jockey—it's rougher, you'll find out, than becoming a champion boxer—in the way the boy grows away from loneliness to self-confidence, and in the way the man, who had been down on his luck and cynical, experiences a return to pride in seeing his protegé make the grade. The usual mobsters drift melodramatically in and out, working to make the man and boy throw the big race, but you won't pay much attention to them. It's the purity of the playing of William Holden and Johnny Stewart, as trainer and jockey, and the quiet, wordless eloquence with which they express their devotion to each other, that will hold you.
Cast: William Holden, Johnny Stewart, Stanley Clements, Basil Ruysdael.—Columbia.

THE GREEN GLOVE

The worthy talents of Glenn Ford and some very handsome scenery in the south of France fight a losing battle with a bad script in The Green Glove. The Green Glove is a mystery—you're supposed to wonder who is the dead man in the church tower near Monte Carlo and how did his body get there. But the real mystery is why an American company sent a director and actors all the way to the French Riviera to shoot a story that would make any comic book look like classical literature. Amidst the general senselessness and amateurishness of The Green Glove, we gathered that Glenn Ford is searching for a jewelled glove worth $100,000. A gang of scoundrels, whose members include one Pepe the Crab, also wants the glove. They chase Glenn up and down mountainsides, throwing threats, bullets and boulders at him. Now and then a mad Countess darts in and out, making like Ophelia in Hamlet, and Geraldine Brooks stands by just in case Glenn has a spare moment for l'amour. The Green Glove lurches along as if nobody had bothered to direct it at all. Come to think of it, there probably wasn't any script either. Maybe everyone just made this one up as they went along. Sounded just like it.

Cast: Glenn Ford, Geraldine Brooks, Cedric Hardwicke, George Macready.—United Artists.

JUST THIS ONCE

"You're the most selfish, egocentric, insufferable human being I ever met," cries Janet Leigh to Peter Lawford in Just This Once. May you conclude from this that Janet loves Peter, loves him, loves him, loves him? You may indeed. For Just This Once is one of those light, frolicsome romantic charades in which boy and girl think they absolutely detest each other—until both realize they have been head over heels in love all along. Just This Once is more charming than most such comedies because Janet and Peter make a most engaging, attractive pair of lovers. Peter is a multi-millionaire playboy who spends money wildly on most of the town's blonde population. Janet is the sober, sensible lawyer hired by Peter's guardian to regulate his spendthrift habits. When Janet cuts Peter's allowance to $50 per week, the bickering commences. That Peter eventually reforms and asks Janet to marry him will come as no surprise but you may be surprised by the nice, breezy touch all through Just This Once. It jests amiably and amusingly about love, money, earnest lawyers like Janet, and blonde-happy millionaires like Peter. "I thought that type went out with high button shoes," says someone in Just This Once, casting a sour eye on playboy Lawford. (So, by the way, did this reviewer.)

Cast: Janet Leigh, Peter Lawford, Lewis Stone, Richard Anderson.—MGM.

THE WILD NORTH

The Northwest Mounted Police always get their man—except, of course, when the man is rugged, stalwart Stewart Granger. Granger is the kind who gives himself up—if he's so inclined. Anyway, Mountie Wendell Corey mushes by dog sled into the icy North to catch Granger, a fur trapper wanted for murder. Corey locates Granger all right, but bringing him back to civilization for trial is quite another matter. The two men get lost in the frozen outdoors for weeks, blizzards rage, the temperature falls to 38 below, an avalanche of ice nearly buries them and finally, when a pack of wolves attacks them, Corey collapses into a numb, mindless creature, staring dully into space. Granger could leave him there to die, but compassion moves him and, in the end, it is the man wanted for murder who brings the Mountie back, rather than the conventional other way 'round. It's a neat story twist which brings distinction to a movie already boasting plenty of tough, virile action. Granger is just the big, hardy chap for this sort of snow-swept adventure; his battle with those hungry wolves will chill your spine faster than a deep freeze. For any who may find it all a little grim, The Wild North provides a happy ending—Stewart Granger is finally acquitted of that pesky murder charge. Seems it was all in self-defense.

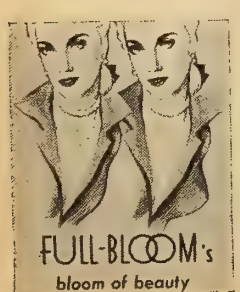
Cast: Stewart Granger, Wendell Corey, Cyd Charisse.—MGM.

ON DANGEROUS GROUND

Like Detective Story, On Dangerous Ground probes the mind and heart of a violent police detective. But unlike Detective Story, this movie is not altogether convincing as human drama. In fact, you can hardly believe it. Sloppily written, On Dangerous Ground uses up half its running time merely to establish the personality of its cruel, brutal detective, Robert Ryan. The heart of the story—Ryan's conversion into a decent, generous human being—is compressed unsatisfactorily into the last part of the movie, and accomplished too hurriedly to be taken very seriously. "Exiled" out of the city after giving someone a fierce beating, Ryan meets a blind farm girl, Ida Lupino, whose young brother is wanted for murder. In loving Ida, and in seeking to save her brother from the lynch spirit that menaces him, Ryan finds salvation from the warped, self-destructive life he had been pursuing. It's a striking, if somber theme, and director Nicholas Ray gets some strong emotion out of it, with the help of a forceful portrayal by Ryan. But Miss Lupino misses fire as the blind girl, perhaps because she is too sophisticated a woman to be playing trusting farm girls, perhaps also because, in this poorly organized screenplay, she does not come into the picture until the last 20 minutes, and then she has to work what amounts to a miracle on Mr. Ryan's extremely nasty character.



Cast: Ida Lupino, Robert Ryan, Ward Bond.—RKO.

JULIA ADAMS SHOPS FOR YOU AT LANSBURGH'S, WASHINGTON, D. C.

YOUR HOLLYWOOD SHOPPER

To JULIA ADAMS, her newest Universal-International technicolor picture "Bend of the River" was no place for a glamour girl, in her opinion. For three weeks she bounced around on a wooden seat of a covered wagon, sacrificed pretty clothes for a pair of men's trousers and a lumberjack shirt, and worked ten hours daily under a grueling sun, eating dust by the ton.

"I used to dream of being fussed over by hairdressers, makeup men and stylists," commented the Little Rock, Ark., brunette wryly. "Instead, I'm fighting for my life with the reins to a four-horse team burning callouses into the palms of my hands. Who ever said moviemaking is glamorous?"

Julia, a recent bride of Writer Leonard Stern, had very little time to enjoy her honeymoon, inasmuch as "Bend of the River" took her away from the bridegroom for five weeks, then two weeks of all-night filming on the back lot continued to keep them apart after the company's return from location. As soon as she finished her part, she and her husband flew out to Nevada for a vacation, as Julia put it, "in a nice little cabin with no phone to call me back to work for awhile."

don't look now, but...
here comes the bride

Nobody's going to do a double-take when Ronnie and Nancy walk down the aisle. They've had that "about-to-be-married" look for over a year.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

■ Almost any night you care to drive down Beverly Boulevard in Hollywood and then pull into the parking lot beside Dave Chasen's fancy restaurant, you are more than likely to run into Ronald Reagan and Nancy Davis. You can almost set your watch by the time they arrive in Ronnie's car—seven-forty-five—and walk through the front door of the famous cafe.

Inside there is no waiting. The lobby can be full of tourists and Hollywood big shots, but Ronnie and Nancy push right through them and are escorted to a front line table where a neat "reserved" sign is whisked away and a waiter hurries up with a menu. They dine slowly and then, for an hour or so, sit back with coffee and visit with the table-hoppers.

Yes, almost any night you will be able to observe this little scene, and, if you are like most folks, you will attach little importance to it. But you will be wrong. It is highly significant. It is very significant, indeed. (Continued on page 91)

Young America is finding out

The Younger Generation (the feminine half of it!) has been a powerful force in spreading a knowledge of Tampax as the sanitary protection for women during "those days" of the month. . . . Sales in women's-college towns prove the campus popularity of Tampax and the hometown circle quickly learns to follow the discoveries of Miss Undergraduate.

Every woman should understand Tampax, which is very different from the older forms of protection. But also it is very simple. It is made of pure absorbent cotton and designed by a doctor to be worn internally. Dainty one-time-use applicators make insertion quick and convenient.

NO BELTS
NO PINS
NO PADS
NO ODOR

Tampax needs no belts, pins or external pads. Eliminates odor and chafing. Cannot "show through" in ridges or bulges. And you cannot even feel the Tampax! . . . Sold at drug and notion counters in 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. A full month's supply will fit into purse. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

FROM THE MOVIES

AARON SLICK FROM PUNKIN CRICK—I'd Like To Baby You by Robert Q. Lewis (MGM). Life Is A Beautiful Thing by Evelyn Knight & Perry Botkin (Decca).
If you like Robert Q. as a TV personality you'll go for the way he handles this newly-fashioned ditty with an old-fashioned sound.

AN AMERICAN IN PARIS—Love Is Here To Stay by Gene Kelly (MGM); David Rose* (MGM).
Still one of the great Gershwin tunes, this opus is given a double-sided break by MGM. On one side is Gene Kelly's version from the film's sound-track; on the reverse is a handsome instrumental treatment by David Rose.

BELLE OF NEW YORK—Oops! by Debbie Reynolds* (MGM).
A cute little ditty by Johnny Mercer and Harry Warren, from the new Fred Astaire vehicle.

I'LL SEE YOU IN MY DREAMS—title song by Doris Day (Columbia); Leroy Holmes* (MGM); Bing Crosby* (Decca); Ray Anthony (Capitol); George Siravo (Mercury); Vaughn Monroe (Victor); Hugo Winterhalter (Victor); Nick Perito (Coral). Swingin' Down The Lane by Bing Crosby* (Decca); Ralph Flanagan* (Victor); Lawrence Welk (Coral); Helen Forrest (MGM).
I Wish I Had A Girl by Blue Barron (MGM); Doris Day* (Columbia); Al Jolson (Decca).
We could run on for columns if we tried to list all the records that have been made of Gus Kahn's songs. A couple of dozen of them are heard in this movie based on his life, with Danny Thomas as the great tunesmith and Doris Day as his wife.
If you're curious about how close the film comes to reality, Gus Kahn was born in Coblenz, Germany, Nov. 1886, and died in Beverly Hills ten years ago last October. He went to California in 1933 to write for pictures, after his Broadway musicals Whoopee and Show Girl had scored big hits.
He wrote, in our opinion, more great songs than Irving Berlin; among them Pretty Baby, Carolina In The Morning, My Buddy, Love Me Or Leave Me, It Had To Be You, Chloe, Carioca, I Never Knew, The Hour Of Parting, Yes Sir That's My Baby, The One I Love Belongs To Somebody Else. What a record! And, as we look through our private collection, what records!

LENA HORNE—Lena Horne Sings (MGM).
Hope you agree with our feeling that Lena Horne would be a great and successful singer even if she weren't so beautiful. Anyway, here's the evidence, some of it from soundtracks of her MGM pictures with conductor-husband Lennie Hayton wielding a brilliant baton; and some sides with a band led by pianist Luther Henderson.
Titles include Deed I Do (of course!), The Lady Is A Tramp, and the wonderful Can't Help Lovin' That Man.

TWO TICKETS TO BROADWAY—Manhattan by Tony Martin and Dinah Shore* (Victor); Jimmy Dorsey (Columbia); Lee Wiley (Columbia).
Best treatment of this great old Rodgers and Hart song is the warm, intimate Lee Wiley version; but to get it you have to buy her whole album (or LP) entitled Night In Manhattan. Which, come to think of it, isn't a bad idea.

POPULAR

NAT (KING) COLE—*A Weaver Of Dreams (Capitol).
A warm and sentimental vocal job by Nat on the new ballad by Victor Young and Ned Washington (they wrote Ghost Of A Chance).

ALAN DEAN—*Blue Moon (Roost).
England's No. 1 ballad singer, who's won all the polls over there, recently settled in this country. Blue Moon and the backing, So In Love, were made in England. By the time you read this his first American recordings will be out on MGM. He's a really fine singer, combining the best elements of the old Sinatra and touches of Eddie Fisher and Eckstine, plus a personality of his own.

BILLY ECKSTINE—*Take Me Back (MGM).
A typical ballad for Billy's fans. Incidentally he can now be seen in his long-delayed first movie, Skirts Ahoy for MGM. Other side of this disc is another version of the tune mentioned above in the Nat Cole listing, Weaver Of Dreams.

RALPH FLANAGAN—*Just One More Chance (Victor).
Harry Prime sings a fine old ballad that was a Bing favorite many years ago. Other side is an instrumental called Dixie Jump; a little tepid for us—we'd rather take our Dixie-cups straight.

DANNY KAYE—There's a Hole In The Bottom Of The Sea (Decca).
This has limited appeal unless you're under eight. Danny's humor needs stronger material when you can't see him.

JAZZ

LOUIS ARMSTRONG-GORDON JENKINS—*Sleepy Time Down South (Decca).
Satchmo's latest version of his theme song, which he first recorded before many of his present-day fans were born, has a fine orchestral setting by Gordon Jenkins. The latest Armstrong movie, by the way, entitled Glory Alley, is reported to give him his best and biggest acting role to date.

ERROLL GARNER—Fine And Dandy (Columbia).
The nimble keyboard wizard is at his best on this, and hits his mellowest mood with the other side, Sophisticated Lady.

GENE KRUPA TRIO—LP record (Mercury).
The drumming ace is reunited with his former tenor sax star, Charlie Ventura, to re-record some of their old hits such as Dark Eyes, Stomping At The Savoy and The Man I Love. Pianist Teddy Napoleon rounds out the trio.

OSCAR PETERSON—*Peterson At Carnegie Hall (Mercury).
One of our favorite pianists in some of his best performances.

COUNTRY AND WESTERN

COWBOY COPAS—'Tis Sweet To Be Remembered (King).

RAY PRICE—Weary Blues (Columbia).

HANK WILLIAMS—Baby, We're Really In Love (MGM)

ELLIOT LAWRENCE-ROSALIND PATTON-COWBOY COPAS—*Don't Leave My Poor Heart Breaking (King).
Interesting combination of Elliot Lawrence's strictly Eastern swing band, his girl singer and a Western vocal favorite.

DOES JOHN AGAR BELONG IN JAIL?

In December, Modern Screen asked its readers, "Is John Agar emotionally maladjusted, or a social menace—a sick boy or a play boy?" In that issue an accompanying article by Lloyd Shearer on Agar's imprisonment encouraged one of the greatest floods of reader mail Modern Screen has ever received. So sharply contrasted were the opinions that two letters (instead of one) were chosen for publication, and $200 will be awarded. The editors appreciate the response to this controversal article and herewith present the two letters which best reflect the most opposite points of view.

YES

Dear Mr. Saxon,

I purchased the December issue of MODERN SCREEN solely because of the caption on the cover, "Does John Agar Belong in Jail?" Without opening the magazine, and unaware of the award for opinions, I mentally replied, "Yes."

Having read the article, and with or without $100, my answer is, "Yes, naturally, and of course, John Agar belongs in jail." Furthermore, cheers for Judge Vernon Hunt for refusing to place the blame for the latest Agar peccadillo on Shirley Temple's slim shoulders. Poor Shirley! Will she never be free?

As to Lloyd Shearer, did Sonny or Mama Agar hire him for this whitewashing detail? Or is it all in the name of the god, Publicity? Drunkenness, arrests, and jail sentences have at least kept John Agar in the public eye since he apparently can't accomplish this by talent.

Someone should advise Mama and Lloyd Shearer that a person does not take anti-alcohol drugs because a person has been "three times in his life slightly tipsy," or by "drinking no more than other young men," that plenty of young men who are inevitably "a part of the cultural pattern of our civilization," a civilization where many people drink to excess to escape the strains of ordinary living" do not drink at all. As for "one bad break after another," didn't Mama ever hear of anyone who had real trouble (Continued on page 99)

NO

Dear Mr. Saxon,

I agree with Mr. Lloyd Shearer—John Agar does not belong in jail.

Mr. Agar is just one more victim of our society's ruling that jails are the punishment for crimes, regardless of the nature or circumstances in which the crime was committed.

It is often the case that, because we haven't learned how to deal with different levels of misbehavior, we throw them all into the same pot, making the lesser criminals into bigger ones by putting them under the influence of hardened criminals.

John Agar is not a criminal. I do not think he is even a delinquent, unless we also choose to call every young man who drives a car while slightly under the influence of alcohol a delinquent. I think it would be highly improbable that we would sentence all of these drunken driving offenders to prison terms . . . our jails would be bulging at the seams, if we did. Why, then, did young John Agar get the full treatment?

I have my own theory about that. Mr. Agar is a celebrity. Mr. Agar is a "Hollywoodite," and Mr. Agar is rather wealthy, according to layman's standards. These three reasons add up to "Who does he think he is?" in many people's opinions.

Regardless of the man involved, many people tend to want to "get even" for what one man has, and (Continued on page 105)

LANA'S LATIN LOVER

by Marsha Saunders

LANA'S IN LOVE AGAIN—BUT

■ When they're making a picture, actresses work six days a week and rest on Sunday so that on Monday the camera can accurately record their perfect loveliness.

After resting for six consecutive Sundays during the filming of The

HOW SOON WILL IT BE BEFORE SHE STARTS SINGING, "SOUTH AMERICA, TAKE HIM AWAY!"?

Merry Widow, Lana Turner decided that on the seventh Sunday she'd celebrate. When Turner celebrates, there is nothing halfway about it. On this particular Sunday, she chartered a DC-3 and flew her whole gang to Tijuana, Mexico, for an exciting afternoon at the bull fights.

When the last bull had been killed, Lana, logically enough, went out with Antonio Velasquez, the chief matador.

Reporters asked Lana if Antonio were her latest heart interest, and the beautiful blonde answered with a smile. "Boys," she said, "you have the wrong Bull of the Pampas."

What Lana meant was that the right Bull of the Pampas was (and is) Fernando Lamas, her tall, dark and handsome leading man in The Merry Widow. (Continued on page 84)

Girls! Girls! Girls! Whether in Paris or at New York's Copacabana, Farley just can't get enough of beautiful chorus dolls like these.

after shelley-what?

by Vicki Blodgett

He'll give you a ring anytime, but it won't be a diamond. Now that Shelley's found Vittorio, Farley's busy spreading himself around.

Night life in Paris sometimes extends to the Halles Centrales, a giant produce depot near the Louvre, where practically all the city's perishable food is brought to be sorted for distribution. Workmen feverishly busy from midnight on, usually pay little attention to the revelers who wind up their play with onion soup at one of the many cafes in the district. But one dawn, a few months ago, they stopped their stooping and hauling for a sight which was too astonishing to disregard. A huge bevy of girls seemed to be skipping and running down the street into their midst.

At second sight it turned out to be very nearly the same thing as at first sight, but now they could count eight or nine girls who were somehow crammed into, above, or around a small, English two-seater runabout driven by a boy. The springs of the car were squawking louder than the horn, the girls were screaming happily and the boy was doing a masterful job despite the legs and arms interlaced all about him. A moment later he stopped the car at one of the restaurants, and after some general untangling, accompanied by merry squealing, all of them disappeared inside. The workmen smiled at each other before going back to work. This was more like it, their expressions seemed to say. This was like the gay Paris of old.

The boy would have agreed with them—even though all he knew about the gay Paris of old was what he had read. But if this was it, it sure agreed with Farley Granger. And as it was in Paris that morning, so it was in Rome, and in London. Now that he is back in Hollywood he smiles reminiscently and hopes that he'll be having those times, with those same girls again. Farley, who loves his friends, even if as yet he's had no loves, makes no attempt to hide what he is—a young man serious about his work, but not overly serious about life.

Two years ago when June Haver and Pat Neal kidded him about forming an "Ex-Farley (Continued on page 72)

Farley isn't lonely. Even though Shelley's mad for somebody else, there's always someone to call. In Rome there's Helene Ramey, in London Melissa Hayden, in Hollywood Peggy Malie—and in New York, Geraldine Brooks.

As soon as Farley returned from Europe, he said he was going to spend Christmas in New York. Friends think the reason is Geraldine Brooks who deserted the movies for TV in the East.

When Shelley Winters falls, it's with a crash. Now the whole world knows she's mad about Italy's biggest heart-throb—Vittorio Gassmann.

BY JIM BURTON

BANG

went the strings of her heart!

■ Ever since her first marriage collapsed six years ago, Shelley Winters has been searching for love. Now, at last, she's found it, and it's affecting her like a super-charged bomb. She's on fire, she's ecstatic, she's breathless. The man responsible is a 29-year-old Italian actor named Vittorio Gassmann, whose mild manner and soulful brown eyes contrast romantically with Shelley's dynamic personality.

"When he's free," Shelley says, "I'm going to marry him. I really am. I'm very much in love with Vittorio. It's entirely different than it was with Farley Granger. Farley and I just played around together—like kids. After all, Farley is three years younger than I am. But what I feel for Vittorio—that's something else again. That's love.

"Just think," she says. "I sent him a cable that said I'M LONELY AND I'M SENDING YOU A KISS and then he sent me a cable that said, I'M LONELY TOO AND I'M RETURNING YOUR KISS. But I never thought that he would fly to California all the way from Italy just to spend six days with me.

"He must feel pretty strong about me to fly all the way from Rome. Think of the trouble, the expense. He's wonderful. He really is. I've never met anyone like Vittorio before."

Oddly enough, Shelley met Vittorio while she was supposedly touring Europe with Farley Granger last November.

Actually, there has never been anything serious between Farley and Shelley. They dated each other because it was good publicity, it was fun and they were both very much interested in acting.

When they arrived in Paris last winter they went their own ways. Farley remained in Paris, and Shelley journeyed on to Rome.

One night in Rome she visited the Teatro Valle, a theater run by Frank Lattimore, the English actor. He recognized Shelley when she called backstage and invited her to a party.

Shelley accepted immediately, but she didn't have a date. "Don't worry," said Lattimore, "I'll get you one."

He phoned Vittorio Gassmann, but Gassmann (Continued on page 99)

When Liz met Michael Wilding three years ago, she never dreamed they'd fall in love, become 1952's most publicized couple!

LIZ DOES IT AGAIN

by Hedda Hopper

Hedda knows all about Liz' latest romance, and here she tells plenty! It's the inside story about the dazzling beauty who set the film colony on its ear.

By the time you read this, Elizabeth Taylor will be Mrs. Michael Wilding. Whether Liz and Michael marry in Hollywood, in England or in Mexico, the British actor will be husband number two for our great screen beauty.

Liz to me has been the Helen of Troy of Hollywood, just as Helen must have been the Liz Taylor of Troy. Both represent Beauty in their time, plus a remarkable talent for getting into situations.

Helen started a war. If men went to battle over women today, Liz would touch off many an incident. But wars are colder things now, so she'll probably go down in history as the gal who hit top score in male conquests.

Romance, for her, has been swift, impassioned and full of ups and downs. At 19 she has two broken engagements, one divorce, an interrupted near-engagement to her credit. Now comes Wilding, the Englishman with whom she'll take a second fling at matrimony. Liz doesn't admit this in so many words. She doesn't need to; she wears a huge sapphire set in platinum and surrounded by diamonds on her third finger—it speaks for itself.

Wilding is a new type for Liz Taylor. He is balding, officially 39 but more often referred to as mid-fortyish. But he could give Casanova lessons in how to kiss a lady's hand. He is a big wheel in British movies and off-stage has tremendous personality and charm—such charm he can make his superiority in years over Elizabeth seem to be an asset. In romance, Wilding is a sophisticate—he has been married and just recently has been divorced—and he is a post-graduate of the Marlene (Continued on page 96)

there is no JEFF CHANDLER

Take a big boy from Brooklyn and turn him into a star. Sometimes he can't believe it. Jeff can't. They keep calling him Chandler; he says, "Who, me?"

BY KATHERINE ALBERT

Louella Parsons was exactly correct when she made her 1950 radio prediction that Jeff and Debra Paget would be stars.

Jeff is happily back with his girls—wife Marjorie and daughters Jamie and Dana. During his seven-month separation from Marjorie, Jeff saw a lot of his children, even moved them into the house they all share now.

■ Most people think they can tell a lot about a person by the way he looks. You figure a small, balding guy has to be a hen-pecked milquetoast, and a big-busted, lush girl must be a sex boat. But it ain't necessarily so. The little fellow may turn out to be a lion, and the size 38 can be nothing but a mouse.

Jeff Chandler looks like a movie star, but try to convince him he is one. He thinks of himself as Ira Grossel—and that's all. Gable's a star. Crawford's a star. But Jeff Chandler? As far as Ira's concerned, Chandler doesn't even exist! Take the time a group of stars went out on the Movietime, U.S.A. show. John Wayne was in the troupe and when he was introduced everyone cheered, Jeff right along with them. Then Jeff Chandler was introduced, and the cheers were almost as great. "I felt like the pretender to the throne. I felt the way the pretender must feel," Jeff said. "It was thrilling to hear the people, but it was difficult to realize they were applauding me in the same way and for the same reasons I had applauded so many movie stars just a few years ago. And I kept thinking, 'They just don't know. They don't understand. I don't feel like a movie star.' "

There are lots of contradictions in Jeff Chandler. His eyes have the wise look of a man who's lived forever, but he's only 33. He looks as if he'd flirt with every pretty babe, but during the seven months he was separated from his wife he was lonely and miserable. He gives off an air of sophistication, but when he meets a celebrity he's almost speechless. There was the time, for instance, when he met Clark Gable. Gable had come to the Universal-International Studios to look over the work of a certain director. Afterwards, he lunched in the commissary with a studio executive. Jeff happened to come into the commissary and when he spotted Gable he couldn't believe his eyes. He walked past the table three times to make sure. Finally, he said, "Well, won't somebody introduce us?" Somebody finally did.

Gable stood up and shook hands. "Then he smiled at me," Jeff said, remembering. "And that really did it. Then turning to the executive who introduced us, he said, 'You sure grow 'em tall over here.' "

Jeff remembers every look, every word the great man said. This is not the way you'd expect a man who has the very same appeal as Gable to act. But that's Jeff, and one of the keys to understanding (Continued on page 105)

Ann Sheridan was his trouble-time pal.

June Allyson, queen tor the second year, wouldn't let go of her trophy at MODERN SCREEN's annual popularity poll party at Ciro's. She was with Dick Powell, Geary Steffen and Jane Powell.

Dale Robertson and MODERN SCREEN editor Chuck Saxon inspected the silver tray Dale won as "most popular male newcomer of the year." Debbie Reynolds, who copped the "most popular" girl's newcomer prize was away on tour for MGM.

A ten-second hush tell over the party when June Haver and Dan Dailey sailed in together. Engrossed in each other, they nibbled hors d'oeuvres oblivious to the stir they were causing.

The party took on a "hearts and flowers" theme when such "happily marrieds" as the Don DeFores and the now reconciled Jeff Chandlers got together. (For more on Jeff, see page 46. M.S. guests braved a torrential rain to get there.

PARTY OF THE YEAR

Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh were so overcome at finding their award citations right up near Ciro's entrance that they threatened to just stand there all evening looking at them. "This is a nice family affair," said Tony to his beaming bride.

Glenn Ford stopped by to receive congratulations from Mr. and Mrs. Keenan Wynn on being one of the "top ten." Glenn wrung out his topcoat on arrival, made a beeline for food.

Dell publisher George Delacorte couldn't resist the beaming faces of Doris Day and her husband, Marty Melcher. Happy Doris had plenty to smile about. She was not only among the "top ten" but won a most popular girl singer award.

KMPC's Jim McCulla broadcast right from a table at Ciro's with Dana Andrews and Joan Evans. The informal party provided enough material for two newsreels and two radio shows.

KEEP THE STARS FROM COMING OUT TO HOLLYWOOD'S EVENT OF THE YEAR—TO SEE WHO WAS WHO IN '51.

■ June Allyson was determined. She would not let go of her silver trophy.

"But, sweetheart," Dick Powell said. "You can't take it with you!"

"Oh, no?" said June, practically wrapping it in the folds of her new velvet party dress. "This is the second time I've won it, and I'm not going to let it go."

This family squabble took place in just about the center of Ciro's at MODERN SCREEN's big (not to say colossal) party for the winners of its 1951 popularity poll. June Allyson was the Queen and she was proud enough to let the whole world know it. Even MODERN SCREEN's editor Charles Saxon couldn't wheedle her into putting that trophy down.

"But you're going to dinner now," he said. "And you don't want to lug that along."

"Oh, no?" said June. "This cup not only goes with me, but for a whole week you will find it right in the middle of the living room."

Editor Saxon was properly overcome. After all, he had just heard a tribute to MODERN SCREEN readers all over the world. In fact, he had just heard a summing up of all Hollywood's attitude toward the first big event of the season.

Later, Dana Andrews told a radio audience, "This is one party of the year I wouldn't miss. (Continued on next page)

We know that MODERN SCREEN's Annual Awards are the on-the-level-result of movie-goers' opinions of us all."

"Not only that," said Van Heflin, "but in my opinion, these awards are prophetic. The winners here tonight—some of them, at least—will be taking Oscars home in the not too distant future." And Van Heflin, who has one himself, ought to know.

But to get to the party—and almost everyone in Hollywood did—it was one of those blowouts that was just for fun. There were no hour-long speeches, not a stuffed shirt in sight. And you never saw so many celebrities in your life. The few who couldn't come sent their love, and top-man John Wayne, who was in Acapulco, sent his voice. This might sound difficult, but it wasn't with Louella Parsons around.

"Hand me a phone," said Louella, and with the phone came Mexico.

"Hello, Duke," said Louella. "I want to tell you that you've won MODERN SCREEN's popularity prize for 1951, and I'm arranging to have the award sent down to you for an official presentation."

Not only was the award delivered 24 hours later—in person—but the person was Hedy Lamarr. She gave the silver cup to John amidst a gathering of high Mexican government officials.

By the way, you may have heard Louella's memorable call on her Sunday ABC radio program. And Jim McCulla's table-hopping interviews were broadcast over the Liberty network. Cameramen from both MGM and 20th Century-Fox brought the party to you via newsreel.

If you caught the newsreel you may have imagined that the party went off like a charm, but it didn't—anyway, not at the beginning. An hour before the event, MODERN SCREEN's editors sat bleakly next to a window watching the torrential rains. "That noise you hear," said Hollywood editor Carl Schroeder, "is my career going down the drain."

But suddenly in walked Glenn Ford with our publisher, George Delacorte. "Don't let that mist bother you," Glenn said. "Let's just wring out our topcoats, pull up a chair and see what happens. I had to skip lunch today, and with a little luck I can eat my way through at least half of those magnificent hors d'oeuvres."

Glenn didn't get a chance to see if he could make it, though. Hedda Hopper arrived, dry as toast under one of her huge hats, and then the doors literally burst open at Ciro's.

John Wayne's great and good friend, Grant Withers arrived, to "sit in for the Duke" as he explained it, and was promptly joined by the Forrest Tuckers, the Bill Holdens (he's one of MODERN SCREEN's almost perpetual top ten, it seems), Piper Laurie, Dorothy Lamour, the Larry Parks, the Bill Bendixes and Bill Demarest.

"I didn't come with nobody," Bill Demarest said, "but I got a reason for coming. You see, them two boys, Duke Wayne and Alan Ladd are old buddies of mine. I talked to Alan in Palm Springs this morning, and he told me I got to get dolled up and get on over here on account of he can't show up, what with his kids being sick. So he's (Continued on page 104)

Top winner John Wayne couldn't make the party (he was in Mexico) but Louella Parsons interviewed him by radio hook-up and later, Hedy Lamarr flew to Acapulco with Duke's trophy.

Marty Melcher, Doris Day and Chuck Saxon couldn't resist leaving fingerprints on the silver trophies. The M.S. photographers took over 50 pictures in the course of the party.

Louella Parsons and Doris Day stepped up to share the glow around Ronald Reagan and his constant companion, Nancy Davis. Nancy never took her eyes off Ronnie.

"No, you can't!" says Glenn Ford. "Yes, I can!" says Bill Holden. And so Hollywood's battling buddies continue to slug it out for top man.

BY JIM HENAGHAN

■ One morning recently Bill Holden got up from his breakfast table and casually said to his wife:

"Honey, I'm going to run into town for about an hour or so."

"Whatever for?" asked Brenda. "I thought you were going to loaf around the yard today."

"I just want to pick up a couple of things at the store," Bill said. "I won't be long." And he reached over and kissed her and was gone.

Brenda leaned over and took a look at the newspaper Bill had been reading while he ate. Then she picked it up and walked into the kitchen. The housekeeper was washing the dishes.

"You want to make me a little bet?" Brenda asked.

"What's that?" asked the housekeeper.

"I will bet," said Brenda, stabbing at a picture in the paper, "that Mr. Holden comes back here in an hour with some of those Slim Jim narrow neckties the men are beginning to wear."

The housekeeper looked at the picture. It was a shot of Glenn Ford getting off a plane, back from Europe. The camera appeared to have been focused on a fancy Slim Jim tie Glenn was wearing.

"You just wait and see," said Brenda.

An hour later Bill walked into the house and announced with a cheery yell that he was back. Brenda came to greet him.

"What have you got in the package there?" she asked.

"Oh," said Bill, "I just happened to pass a haberdashery and I saw some of those narrow neckties in the window, so I bought a few. I think I'll begin wearing them."

"That figures," said Brenda.

"What?" asked Bill.

"Nothing," said Brenda. "What do you want for lunch?"

It has always been that way, ever since Bill Holden and Glenn Ford have known each other. All Hollywood knows it, but neither Bill nor Glenn will admit it. Whatever one does—the other will do, and try to do it better. Whatever fad one starts, the other will pick it up—and claim he originated it. If Glenn Ford took up croquet tomorrow morning, (Continued on page 93)

Glenn and Bill flipped coins to see "who" played "what" in their co-starrer, The Man From Colorado. Originally Glenn was hired as an understudy for Bill back when Columbia filmed Golden Boy.

Bill kibitzes while Glenn struggles through a card game with Ed Buchanan. The boys are "friendly and eternal enemies"—always trying to top each other one way or another both on screen and off.

Glenn and Bill watch their sons struggle to uproot "Safoot," a very stubborn mule. The Fords and Holdens are close, but the competitive spirit is visible even among the junior members of the two families.

The dramatic effect of the soft wall-to-wall drapery is heightened by the sharp lines of the low coffee table, the two huge chairs. All the wooden furniture has a natural blond finish so as not to show dust.

Paul Fox, Scott's decorator, chose the color scheme carefully. Paul's theory, with which Scott agrees, is that a monochrome room is more masculine than one full of color. But bright touches like the burnt-orange chair add interest.

UP IN BRADY'S PLACE

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

■ It was six A.M. of a beautiful winter's day in Westwood Village, a small, fashionable community four miles from 20th Century-Fox.

In the low, white apartment house where Scott Brady lives, everyone was sleeping except Brady. The tall, tousle-headed kid from Brooklyn was preparing breakfast in the kitchen of his bachelor apartment. The preparation sounded like an atomic bomb somewhere in Nevada.

Pots and pans bounced off the floor, Scott's baritone voice bounced off the ceiling, towers of smoke swirled up from the frying pan, and water gushed from the taps at full speed.

The bedlam woke Scott's kid brother, Eddie, who happened to be spending the night up at Brady's place. He was sleeping in the soft, foam-rubbered daybed that serves as the living room couch. Eddie raised himself on one elbow. "For cryin' out loud," he shouted, "what's goin' on out there?"

"I'm getting breakfast," Scott shouted back.

Eddie got up and shuffled into the kitchen. (Cont'd on next page)

But there are drawbacks to even the rosiest set-up! Scott goes about washing windows cheerfully, however, knowing that it's a small price to pay for the independence and privacy he has.

The terrace, shielded from the sun by bamboo blinds, is a perfect place to relax, to entertain friends. Scott's especially fond of the wrought-iron railing, thinks it's very romantic.

"Hey, you don't have to go to all this trouble for me."

"No trouble," Scott said. "I do this every morning."

Eddie rubbed his scalp. "You do?" This was a surprise to the youngest of the Tierney clan, because when Gerald Tierney lived at home—that's Scott Brady's real name—he was the one Mom had to call and shake for 15 minutes before he'd even turn over, never mind get up.

Now here he was in his own kitchen, bare-foot, stripped to the waist, wearing only a pair of blue jeans and cooking like crazy. With a tumbler full of chilled orange juice in one hand, he stood in front of his stove shifting his attention from burner to burner. In one skillet a dozen slices of Canadian bacon sputtered beautifully. A chemex of coffee on the back burner sent up an appetizing aroma. And on another, Scott had set his piece de resistance, an omelet of eggs, chopped onions and cheddar cheese.

Eddie couldn't believe it. "You been goin' to a cooking school or something?"

Scott grinned. Like a master chef he flipped the omelet onto a platter, removed a tin of hot rolls from the oven, put the coffee on the table, and then motioned to his brother. "Sit down, kid," he said, "and have a little food."

Eddie sat, but the wonderment of it all was too much for him. "I don't get it," he confessed. "At home you never even ate breakfast."

"Gee, kid," Scott explained. "I couldn't ask Mom to fix me a big meal at six in the morning. I don't mind doing it myself, but you couldn't ask that of any woman, not even Mom. Besides, I like looking after myself."

Ever since Scott announced six months ago that he was leaving the Tierney family apartment to live alone, his folks have wondered why.

A friend suggested that perhaps Scott wanted to have a place of his own where he might entertain his friends, especially of the opposite sex. After all, there's a lot of competition in the Tierney family. Let Scott bring his date home and introduce her around, and the very next thing anyone knows, Scott's date is no longer Scott's. The girl has switched to Larry or Eddie.

When you ask Scott if this is the reason he took a bachelor apartment, he hedges and says, "Not at all. I just wanted a little privacy."

In direct contradiction to this explanation is the fact that Scott is rarely alone. In and out of his apartment, he is usually accompanied by one of his two brothers, his agent, or his stand-in.

Brady isn't particularly articulate or profound and sometimes he finds it difficult to explain things, but actually his bachelor apartment is simply part of his growing up, of going out on his own.

Scott isn't sure when the idea of looking for an apartment first struck him, but it probably coincided with Johnny Darrow's getting him a couple of big pictures at Universal and two at 20th Century. Johnny is a top agent who helped June Allyson, Gene (Continued on page 102)

Rumor is that Jane may yet adopt the 15-month-old child she and her mother brought back from London.

■ Her mother says simply, "I lost the reins."

Jane says, "I just had to go through all that. I'm not sure why . . . but I had to learn for myself."

These are the words with which they recall the time in Jane Russell's life two years before Hollywood discovered her when her teen-age idealism mixed oddly with the world as she found it . . . and she rebelled. For three months she stayed away from home, living with a girl friend, and trying to find herself. This was a period when her whole character was to be tested and her whole life shaped into its final mold. This was to be the emotional crisis of her youth . . .

Perhaps it all began during her last year of high school when the gang she traveled with became enamored of the free-spirited poets and writers, of Edna St. Vincent Millay, of Shelley and Byron and Thomas Wolfe . . .

"SOMEBODY LOVES ME"

by sheilah graham

SOMEBODY LOVES HER, BUT BETTY'S TIRED OF WONDERING WHO. SHE WANTS A MAN NOW!

■ If Betty Hutton has convinced herself that Charles O'Curran has a brain, and that he will be a good father to her kids, the handsome young dance director and the blonde tempestuous star will be man and wife by the time you read this story. But if happy-go-lucky Charlie, who had proposed to Betty every hour on the hour for the past three months, had failed on either count, there'll be a new guy reading this issue of MODERN SCREEN in Betty's beautiful French Provincial front parlor.

Having covered every eventuality—I hope—let me tell you why a guy like O'Curran and a gal like Hutton get to be an inseparable item in Hollywood.

Betty, at 30, is desperate. Somewhere in this chaotic world she wants to find peace and happiness for herself and her two children. And that means—a man in the house. And that, of course, means a husband. And she wants him now. She won't rest until she can sing those three words, "Somebody loves me," to all the world.

Charles is available. This, in Hollywood, is more potent than looks, wealth or position. There are practically no eligible men here. And for every man who is free and over 21, there are 20 eager movie maidens who must have an escort, or they are dead, socially speaking. Married women positively will not invite "single" stars to parties. They're afraid they might lose their husbands.

Betty loves parties. She needs a man who will take her everywhere, who won't sulk in quiet corners when she huddles with other fascinating people, who will always be there when she wants him, and happy to take her home when she is tired or bored.

O'Curran is one of the most easy-going guys I know. His placidity makes a good bouncing board for Betty's vivacity. Because of his work and contacts, he moves in the same social orbit as Betty. This is important. The unwritten code forbids a star's falling in love with a guy in a lower strata. Did you ever hear of a top actress marrying an extra?

And this is most important. Charlie loves Betty. Betty doesn't breathe right unless there is a man who loves her. "She's the most wonderful girl I ever met," Charlie told me when I asked him about marriage plans. "I'll be the proudest man in Hollywood with Betty as my wife. But because of her children, she won't rush into marriage until she's absolutely sure." I was glad that Betty was pausing despite her eagerness for a mate. She isn't exactly famous for looking before leaping.

Her desperate way of loving began 'way back when she first came to Hollywood, a frightened, insecure kid, fresh from the New York stage. If any man so much as smiled, Betty was immediately ready to swoon.

Betty isn't frightened any more. But the insecurity is almost as obvious as when she told me breathlessly, nine years ago—"I'm engaged to marry Perc Westmore." Perc gave her a big ring. The engagement lasted a month. Norman Krasna's ring was bigger. The engagement was over after five days. Betty, a lady from way back, returned both rings, but kept her longing for a man to love and cherish her—until dissatisfaction does them part.

When I asked O'Curran, "Did you buy Betty a ring?" he admitted, "I'd be afraid to, might scare her off." He wasn't kidding. Betty scares easily—but only in the marriage department. She'll get engaged at the drop of the question. But, when she's just shopping for romance, then it's something else. (Continued on page 100)

Charles O'Curran welcomed her home from Honolulu and as of now is top man.

■ Most cities have several quaint, quiet, little restaurants where lovers meet for a rendezvous. Even Hollywood has one or two. Romeo's Chianti is a place like that. It's an Italian restaurant—small, warm, unobtrusive—located on Melrose Avenue just a few blocks away from Paramount. The table cloths are checkered red; the food is superb, and the music on the phonograph is always operatic.

In this restaurant Mario Lanza fell madly in love. After seven hectic, exciting, incredible years, he is more in love than ever. "My Betty," he raves, "she's absolutely wonderful, too good for me, an angel. She's the best thing that ever came into my life. Without her, who knows where I'd be today? With her, I'm always in heaven."

And he was in heaven on that unforgettable August night in 1944 when he proposed to Betty Hicks, a trim, brown-eyed brunette from Chicago.

The scene, of course, is indelibly stamped in Betty's mind. She was 22 at the time, ready for romance, and it came with a speed and passion that left her breathless.

"I'd known Mario for a few months—he was in uniform all the time—and on August 29th—I will never forget that date—he came by and said, 'Honey, let's go to Romeo's.' So that's where we went."

It was a warm, clear California night, when even the smallest stars were out, but Mario was in too much of a hurry to get

She was the rage of Paris, the toast of all Europe. And now Leslie Caron has danced her way into the heart of America!

BY JANE WILKIE

pretty-eyed bébé

■ In the late spring of 1950, a blasé young man behind the soda fountain of New York's La Guardia Airport found himself confronted by a wide-eyed young girl. "Eef you please," she said, "I would like some of your ice creams." She twirled the seat of the stool with an experimental finger, looked down the long expanse of shining counter and sighed, "I theenk a ba-nana spleet."

To the soda jerk the French accent was no novelty—he was accustomed to dialects—but there was something about the girl that made it difficult to take his eyes off her. She was so intense, so earnest, and when she looked at him it wasn't in an offhand manner, it was a direct gaze from chalk-blue eyes, tilted at the corners, that made him wonder if she wanted to start a conversation. But at the same time he had the feeling that if he did speak, she would bolt and run in fright.

Those who've seen An American In Paris, were left with the same impression of Leslie Caron. She is like a fawn, her eyes seem to listen as well as see, and her lithe young body is still and intent one moment, and then suddenly moving with swift grace.

That "ba-nana spleet" was Leslie's first plunge into American ice cream. It was the way she chose to spend the 20 minutes allowed her in New York before changing planes for Hollywood, and the reason behind it was that her mother hails from Topeka, Kansas. Margaret (Continued on next page)

Leslie, who never had time for dates in Paris, became a social butterfly in Hollywood, wed George Hormel in September after a whirlwind courtship.

Petit Caron had spent many a charmed hour describing America to her young daughter. Often Leslie would sit by her mother's bedside in the early morning, talking for hours about the land of skyscrapers and Indians and mechanical things and the beautiful hair of the American girls. To Leslie it was like a fairy tale, but the thing that fascinated her most was the American soda fountain.

Leslie has been introduced, in the past year and a half, to a great deal more than our ice cream. She was uprooted from all the things dear and familiar to her in France and transported to Hollywood in an immense plane, then plummeted into the pink-and-white world of the movies. She improved her English, dated men for the first time, studied dramatics, visited her first nightclub, and starred opposite Gene Kelly in a film that turned out to be a masterpiece. She met and married George Hormel, heir to the Hormel meat fortune, and with the release of the movie became the toast of America as well as France. Yet Leslie feels she has not accomplished much since arriving in America. "I have no time for books, no time for attending the concerts," she says, "and that is bad."

Self-education is a driving force with Leslie, for although her schooling in a French convent was probably superior to that given a great many of the world's children, she feels that travel and music and books are the things that teach life, rather than geography and algebra. She is unaware that already, with only 20 years of life behind her, she is a cosmopolite who charms cynics right out of their boredom.

MARGARET Petit, her mother, left Kansas to study dancing and eventually became the premiere danseuse of the Greenwich Follies on Broadway. Her health broke under the strain and in order to rest she went to Paris, intending to paint. It was there she met and married Claude Caron, a manufacturer's chemist. Their first child was a son, Aimery. Leslie arrived little more than a year later. They grew up in the hilltop home of their grandparents in Neuilly, a suburb lying northwest of old Paris. Aimery, as big brother, was expected to watch over Leslie. He reacted to this responsibility by promptly introducing her to his friends, who accepted Leslie as one of the gang and expected her to do anything they could do. This included hanging on for dear life to a board set on roller skates which, laden with as many kids as it would hold, hurtled down from the top of a hill through the winding streets. Then there was the tree house, built by Aimery and Leslie, whose roof was formerly the lid of the family washing machine. The lid was sorely missed, but because the tree house was out of reach of everyone but the two children, no one ever found it. The attic of the family home yielded a small stove which the children hoisted into the tree and used to make pancakes. Later they found an old victrola, which was likewise stowed in the tree, and Leslie and her brother dreamed away many an afternoon listening to Chopin and Brahms.

Eventually, Aimery was sent away to boarding school, and his absence would have left a great void in Leslie's life, if she hadn't become interested in ballet. She was 11 at the time, and she accompanied a friend to a ballet class. Leslie sat quietly watching, wholly fascinated, then went home and announced, "I want to become a dancer."

Margaret Caron pleaded with her. "I have always said you could choose your life. You can be anything you like—an actress, a painter, a nurse—but please, don't be a dancer. It's the most difficult work in the world. It will break your health. You don't realize the hardship—"

"But I want to be a dancer," said Leslie in a firm but faraway voice.

She began with one lesson a week, increased it to two, then three. When she was 14 she saw a professional ballet for the first time and came home with stars in her eyes. "I never dreamed it was so beautiful," she said. "All the lights, the music, the costumes—"

"Well," said her mother, sounding very much like Topeka, Kansas, "I suppose that's that. We'll take you out of the convent. If you're to be a dancer, you must devote your life to it. You can study at the National Conservatory."

Claude Caron's parents were horrified. The French Catholic church frowns on dancers, and despite the popularity of ballet in France, to the Caron family it was comparable with the devil himself. Leslie's mother flew to her aid. "We haven't much money," she pointed out. "We can't give Leslie the advantages of high society. Nothing would be so dull for her as a routine education and a routine office job. If she wants to live life, she is better off in the ballet." She smiled to herself and added, "In show business."

With her mother by her side, Leslie went on and upward like a balloon caught by the wind. The war was over and the liberation of France was complete. In the past years, the family had left Neuilly to go to the south of France for a year in 1939. They returned to live on the Left Bank during the war, sent the children to Cannes during the occupation, and now all were happily settled back in Paris near the Place d'Etoile. When Leslie was 15 she joined the Ballet des Champs Elysees and soon had a bit part all her own. Her first solo performance, a dance that left her alone on the stage for 30 seconds, was given on a night when the theater was crammed with celebrities and royalty. Leslie was dressed as a clown, her face covered by a mask, and during the first ten seconds she made what to a ballerina is a disastrous error. From a difficult step she landed in the wrong position—perhaps two degrees off. Says Leslie now, "I think to myself, I miss it. People are going to scream. I better walk out. But the music goes on and I think I better stay. Afterward people applaud like—how you say—like mad—and I think they are mad, perhaps. Or there is someone else on the stage. But no, it is for me. My mother, she comes backstage afterward and says 'You were very good, darling'. I do not understand. I have made a most awful meestake."

However unforgivable Leslie herself considered it, it didn't seem to matter to anyone else, for soon she was on tour and doing the same solo bit part before the King and Queen of Egypt. Lebanon followed, then Greece, where the company danced for the Queen. Because Leslie was the youngest of the troupe, she was chosen to present flowers to the Queen. The very thought petrified her. "There I am so very nervous, and here comes the Queen with her pretty children. She is very gracious and presents me the children. I do not know quite what to do so I bow" (rhymes with low) "and then the little prince extends me his hand. I am so very stupid and I bow again before I am sensible enough to take the child's hand."

That faux pas didn't seem to bother anyone but Leslie, either, and soon there was a special ballet written for her, "Oedipus and the Sphinx." It was during the Paris season following the tour that Gene Kelly attended the Ballet des Champs Elysees and was struck with Leslie's talent. He went backstage after the performance to congratulate her, but Leslie had gone home. She had known he was in the audience that night—it was common knowledge via the backstage grapevine—but had no thought that he would want to see her. It is doubtful she would have stayed even if she had known, for at this point Leslie's great success was the talk of all Paris and she was perpetually swamped with compliments, congratulations and the adoration of the public. She was only 16 and found the adulation too much to bear in comfort. Some people are so constructed that they can listen to praise from sunrise till sunset and lap it up with ease, but to Leslie it was as though she was being pushed and jostled with the unceasing acclaim. Even her family could talk of nothing else once she was home, and this included her father's family who, once Leslie's name appeared in the tiniest print on a programme, had turned completely human and considered the ballet the greatest thing that ever happened to France, and Leslie the greatest thing that ever happened to ballet. The plaudits kept pouring in, building up pressure, and Leslie wished desperately she could be just a plain human being once more, sitting in the tree house and listening to music.

HER negative reaction was possibly due to her health which, as her mother had prophesied, was breaking under the strain. There had been little to eat in France during the war, during those years when Leslie was growing so fast and needed nourishment. There had been little meat, milk or eggs and only squash had been fairly plentiful. But people can't grow healthy, or particularly happy for that matter, on a diet of squash, and Leslie developed anemia, which became more serious as she pursued her strenuous career. Of necessity she stopped working for a whole year, but never once in all that time did she even think of leaving the ballet. Back with the company she went on tour through Holland, Belgium and England, where a command appearance was made before the Queen and Princess Margaret Rose. For the latter performance Leslie was honored by having her act included in the chosen four out of the possible 20. She was as excited as anyone else, for the French people feel a close alliance with English royalty, and before the performance began Leslie was flat on the floor of the stage along with 39 other girls in the cast, lifting the heavy fringe at the bottom of the curtain in order to see the Queen and Princess in their box. Excitement got the better of them and they soon became so obvious that the Queen noticed the line of faces, whereupon she smiled and waved to them.

It was the high spot in Leslie's young life until the spring of 1950, when Gene Kelly again came to Paris to find a leading lady for An American In Paris. He wanted a girl who could dance, act and speak a bit of English, and like a homing pigeon he went straight to the Ballet des Champs Elysees.

First he interviewed Leslie at his hotel and gave her a scene to study, then arranged a screen test which was flown back to Hollywood. "Don't count on it," he told her. "These things take time. There is only a chance you'll be chosen."

Leslie went home with mixed reactions. She didn't want to leave the ballet. It was fun, traveling around the world with the troupe. But the doctor had said her health would not stand the strain of dancing year in and year out. Because of this she had given a thought to movies—French movies—and had even taken some tests, although, as yet, nothing had come of them. But there was America to consider, too. Ever since she'd been a little girl it was always, "when we go to America—"

Weeks passed and Leslie almost forgot about it. Then, the day before a new show opened, Gene Kelly telephoned her. It was all set, he said. His studio was so enthusiastic that a contract had already been drawn up. "You'll have to pack right away," he said. "You'll leave in three days."

"So then," says Leslie, "I am so excited I jump on my head!" She went home to the family and they almost collapsed at the news. "But should I go?" Leslie wanted to know.

"Should you go!" they howled in unison. "Of course!"

There was frantic packing, and hurried farewells. Leslie said goodbye to her friends in the ballet, kissing them on the cheek three times as was the custom. It seemed no time at all before she and her mother boarded the plane, and they left France without even knowing if the French moviemakers had decided that Mademoiselle Caron was worthy of a contract. The plane's sleeping accommodations were wasted on Leslie. She sat by the window and looked until her eyes felt they were being pulled from their sockets. England, Ireland, Newfoundland, the soda fountain in Manhattan, a stop at Chicago, and they were on their last hop to Hollywood.

The day after she arrived in Hollywood, she was invited to Gene Kelly's home, where she met his family and many people with whom she would work. Leslie was terrified and stood in a corner as often as possible. It seemed people were staring at her "with beeg eyes" and momentarily she wanted to be back in France, where everyone was not a stranger. She had little time to be homesick, however, for the next day she was introduced to all the important men at MGM and, although her hands were clammy and her heart going like a pom-pom gun, she managed to read aloud from the English script they handed her.

Mrs. Caron returned to France, where she and Claude Caron sold their home and went back to the Virgin Islands to live. Aimery went on to Hollywood, to share an apartment with his sister. With Aimery near, plus the passage of time, Leslie learned there was nothing to fear in Hollywood, that its people were warm and friendly, and she began working with enthusiasm. For two months she rehearsed dances every day and studied English on the side. Today she has perfected the language to the point where she pronounces even Paris the way we do, rather than retain the French pronunciation. She explains this is necessary, for if she lets one French word or inflection slip into her conversation, she lapses entirely into her native tongue.

She turned 19 in July of 1950 and soon was dating men for the first time. She had had many admirers in France, but ballerinas are a very close group, seldom going with outsiders, so that at home she had had no opportunity for romance. And because it is not proper for young French girls to visit Paris night clubs or even sidewalk cafes, Hollywood's night clubs were the first thing of their kind that Leslie had seen. Aimery watched his sister emerging from her cocoon and teased her about it in the evenings when she was cooking their dinner. In Paris, Aimery's friends had formed a pool, with a case of wine going to the boy who would give Leslie her first kiss. The wine was never collected, and in America, George Hormel came along before Hollywood's bachelors had much time for beginning the wine-winning project.

They met briefly at a cocktail party and young George was immediately attracted to Leslie. She noticed him for only one reason. "He has one eyebrow, you know," she says. "Very funnee." We understand this to mean that George Hormel has all the eyebrows necessary to a human being, but that there is not the usual absence above the bridge of the nose.

Not long after their first meeting, Leslie was planning to have dinner with two other girls, one of whom had a date with Jimmy Hormel, George's brother. These two were going to see Ella Logan afterward at the Greek Theater, while Leslie and the other girl friend were to follow the dinner with a concert at the Hollywood Bowl. But that afternoon George happened to ask his brother about his plans and Jimmy told him he was meeting some friends for dinner. "Who'll be there?" George wanted to know.

"Among others," said Jimmy, "Leslie Caron. At least, for dinner."

"Who's she?" George wanted to know. "What a memory! You almost melted over her the other night at the cocktail party."

"That girl!" yelled George. "Wait for me!"

He went to dinner with them and talked the girls into accompanying the rest of them to the Greek Theater. By adroit maneuvering he managed to sit next to Leslie, and Miss Logan's talents that night were wasted on George. After the show they went to Ella Logan's home, where she was charmed by Leslie and asked for her phone number. And Leslie, throwing shyness to the winds, answered in clarion tones.

"Sure I say eet loud," she says now. "I think this Geordie is pretty cute. Veree cute, in fact."

George Hormel used his head as well as his ears and phoned Leslie for dinner the next day. He proposed to her, before the soup was served, in French.

"Geordie is veree funnee," she explains. "He proposes in French because he knows he has such a cute English accent. Geordie," she adds, "he is funnee all over."

Leslie replied that evening that Mr. Hormel must be out of his mind—that he hardly knew her. He knew very little, in fact, other than that he loved her. A week went by, during which they dined together every night, before he learned he had been wrong in thinking she worked as an extra in movies. At the end of that week he asked if she would fly with him to his family's home in Austin, Minnesota. The trip, the chance to see more of America, may have appealed in part to Leslie, but after seven dinner dates she was more than willing to spend time with George. His parents (his mother is French-born) found her captivating and she was equally impressed with them, but Leslie returned to Hollywood without a decision. Her mind was made up for her on September 22 when the studio handed her a script and told her she would begin work almost immediately on MGM's Glory Alley with Ralph Meeker. She was due to go to San Francisco on Monday for the opening of An American In Paris, then to Florida for a publicity matter, then to begin working on the new picture on her return to Hollywood. That afternoon she told George, realizing they couldn't possibly be married for three months.

"That makes it simple," said George. "Let's get married tonight."

THEY bought a wedding ring just before the stores closed and phoned an airline for reservations to Las Vegas. George phoned his two brothers, then Aimery. "What're you doing tonight?"

"You have a party, yes?" asked Aimery.

"Well, sort of," grinned George. His mother was visiting Hollywood at the time and when Leslie and George had rounded up Mrs. Hormel and the three brothers, everybody was hysterical. Particularly Aimery, who knew little about the romance and couldn't believe his kid sister was actually altar-bound.

They arrived in Las Vegas at four o'clock on Sunday morning, and everyone headed for the hotel except Leslie and George, who took off to get their license. Finding the bureau closed, they took a taxi to get breakfast, inviting the driver to join them. The license acquired, they made an appointment with a minister for six-thirty A.M., then went to collect the family. The ceremony, replete with organ music (Bach, requested by Leslie, granted) sent both the older and newer Mesdames Hormel into tears. George wired his father in Minnesota, "YOU HAVE JUST BECOME THE FATHER OF A HUNDRED AND TEN POUND GIRL," and Leslie wired her parents in the Virgin Islands that she had changed her name, and they all flew back to Hollywood, the newlyweds speechless with happiness.

After a harried honeymoon in San Francisco and Florida, and a visit to the Virgin Islands to see Leslie's parents, they settled down in a rented house in Laurel Canyon, filled with furniture, including a piano, from George's bachelor apartment. For George plays hot piano, and has temporarily resigned his job with the Hormel Company in order to study, and make jazz recordings.

Leslie appreciates his talent—she likes the rhythm and spontaneity of jazz—and often dances as he plays. Once in a while she'll spin a record of her own, and when George makes a face at Bach, Leslie smiles in a very grown up way and tells him that one day he will learn to love it, because it is a part of her.

She wants to return to Paris only to show her city to George. In the beginning she missed France but now she loves it here, loves the country and the people. And the American people love her. They are—how you say—enchanté.

THE END

Gary seems to have inherited the Crosby tendencies for careless attire—wears jeans and short beard on campus. Known as a "regular guy," he spends most of his time studying, hasn't enough leisure for heavy dating.

Joan Benny's another Stanford frosh with a famous father (Jack). She met Gary over cokes in a campus sweet shop, thinks he's "just terrific."

The Stanford campus absorbed freshman Crosby without a ripple. Gary went out for football, but failed to make the team. Competition is rugged.

HE MAY BE A FAMOUS SON BUT HE'S JUST ANOTHER FRESHMAN NOW—THAT'S O.K. WITH GARY

Gary Crosby of Stanford U.

BY CYNTHIA MILLER

■ One afternoon several weeks ago, an attractive little co-ed was sipping a coke at The Cellar, a well-known snack bar on the campus at Stanford University.

As soon as she put the straw to her lips, a stocky, blond male with the regulation crew cut, flopped down beside her.

"Hi," he said quietly.

The co-ed, whose name happened to be Joan, turned and looked. She liked what she saw. "Hello," she answered.

The boy grinned. "You a freshman?" he asked.

"Yes. Are you?"

The crew cut nodded. "How do you like Stanford?"

The girl's eyes twinkled. "I think Stanford's just terrific . . . By the (Continued on page 80)

(Continued from page 41) Granger Girl Friends Club," saying that Gloria de Haven and Ann Blyth, among others, would be invited to join, he good-naturedly agreed that something ought to be done to curb his activities. Now that his pal Shelley ("I am lonesome, Vittorio") Winters has decided to stop marking time with him and turn to earnest romance with Signor Gassmann, he is wishing her all the best. And he is looking forward to an immediate future much like his immediate past, but between Farley and his bachelorhood there is already an understanding. There must be an eventual parting.

FARLEY has always said that he likes to travel and meet the people—girls especially. So in a sense he is looking. He admits it. "Somewhere, sometime, I should meet someone who will make me feel that I don't want to meet anyone else," he says. "That's in the book for me."

The girls he took en masse to that onion soup breakfast in Paris were members of the English chorus featured at the Club Lido on the Champs Elysees. For a bachelor the safety factor in girls is to go out with a quantity of them so that there is too much distraction to particularize. But Farley takes his risks, too. When he was in Rome with Shelley, and she was getting to know Vittorio, he was getting to know Helene, despite a formidable language barrier between them.

Helene Ramy is a fascinating French ballerina turned actress. She is a brunette, and a beauty, says Farley, "that a fellow should never write home about if his mother worries easily." Farley didn't write home about Helene, but he did take notes just in case.

They met at a sort of international dinner party. Farley and Shelley were the only Americans present. Helene, of course, is Paris-born. There was also an Italian actress and two Jugoslavian actors. Incidentally, they were eating in a Hungarian restaurant.

Despite the fact that Helene's knowledge of English is scant, and Farley's French and Italian practically non-existent, he not only managed to make a date with her but went walking in the park with her the next day and had a three-hour conversation! How this could be is best explained by Farley himself:

"We discussed art, movies, ourselves, romance, Hollywood, bouillabaisse, dramatic technique and the stupidity of people who know only their own tongue. How did we talk? Easy—we pantomimed. If we didn't know a word, and usually we didn't, we acted it out. Sometimes it would take ten minutes to present one complete sentence but at the end we not only understood each other but applauded our acting!"

Unfortunately Farley's initial success at communicating with Helene went to his head and the next day he unthinkingly called her on the telephone from his room at the Hotel Excelsior. As soon as he heard her say, "'Allo?" he knew he had pulled a boner. How can you perform pantomime over a telephone?

But Farley wasn't stumped! He rushed to the hallway outside his room and yelled for a bellboy. The one who came running turned out to be an Italian who could talk French all right—but not English! Yet he had to do. At least he could see Farley.

An hilarious three-way conversation followed which someday may even become part of a Granger movie. Farley acted out his words for the bellboy who spoke them to Helene. Her answers were acted out by the bellboy for Farley while Helene waited. But it worked and at the conclusion Farley and the boy congratulated each other for wonderful performances.

The call was about another date, of course. At the appointed time and place Farley was there, and within a reasonable time, Helene showed up. With one skillful wave of her hand she managed to signal, "Hello! How are you? I am sorry I am late" . . . and the acting started all over again.

WHEN Farley says he wants to see the girls he met on his last trip, most of his friends think he has Helene in mind. But he could mean others. He could mean Peggy Malie, who worked with him in I Want You in Hollywood, or Melissa Hayden, who dances with New York's City Center Ballet and was playing an English engagement in London when he was there, or maybe even Betty, Madge or Caron who dance at the Lido. And there is still another for whom his admiration is unbounded—Geraldine Brooks who deserted the movies for TV in New York. Farley was no sooner back in Hollywood than he announced plans to spend Christmas in New York, seeing as much of Geraldine as he could.

The time he spent with other girls in Europe was not time he denied Shelley, who joined him there, and whom he had promised to escort around. She was ill a good deal of the time.

In London, Farley was supposed to escort Shelley to the British Festival but didn't—again she was struck down by the same malady. At this point Peggy Malie unexpectedly walked in. She had been in Paris and had suddenly decided to cross the Channel. She didn't even take time to change the plaid coat and slacks she had on when the notion struck her.

An RKO starlet was handed one of Jane Russell's gowns and ordered to assume a cheesecake pose. She turned to the wardrobe woman and queried, "Haven't you got one for a beginner?"

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

Shelley immediately suggested that Peggy accompany Farley to the expedition. But while there was to be no formality about the visit you still don't make personal appearances in London in slacks. Peggy simply rolled hers up above her knees so they were hidden by the coat and she and Farley were off. An hour later she again showed her resourcefulness when someone at the festival got the signals crossed and introduced the pair to the crowd as "Shelley Winters and Farley Granger."

Farley was for straightening out the mistake but Peggy pulled him back beside her. "Forget it," she whispered. "Don't make a fuss." And very sweetly she stood up and bowed her head (which is blonde) left and right. It went over fine and when they got back to Shelley they were able to tell her that she made a swell impression that night.

In every fellow's life there is at least one girl who gets him to thinking that she would make a very practical partner. In Farley's life that girl happens to be Melissa Hayden. Melissa likes to have fun but she also keeps a sharp eye on what's happening around her at all times. When she is with a mixed group of couples dining out, for instance, and the waiter brings the bill in one whopper of a check, everyone automatically waits for Melissa to do the accounting. She can mentally "tote" up just what each escort owes, in a flash, and be so exact that nobody would dream of arguing with her . . . not even the waiter if she happens to catch him in a bit of excessive additfon.

FARLEY thinks that one of the outstanding personalities he met in England was Dame Sybil Thorndike, who is in her eighties and was starring in Waters Of The Moon, a legitimate play which he went to see in London. Afterwards he literally sat at her feet as they talked about the theater.

"I am so glad you young people have come to see us," she said. "You are so fresh and animated in your ways."

But as she was talking Farley felt that she herself was showing more vitality and energy than even Shelley could. He told this to Shelley later and she promptly snapped, "But I've been sick!"

Farley's parting words to Dame Sybil Thorndike were: "I'll never know what you know about acting by the time I am your age."

"My dear boy," she replied, "by the time you're my age you can have learned everything."

When he told that to Shelley she said, "And you'll need every year of it!"

This is the bantering kind of relationship he's had with Shelley that he's going to miss. And Farley knows it. "I think it is easy enough to be attracted to someone, even to fall in love," he has said. "But it is not so easy to make a real friendship.

"You know," he added, in a lighter vein, "some fellows once told me, you are pretty mixed up when you think that the more girls you know the more you'll know about girls.

"Well, it's pleasant confusion. I wouldn't want to give it up just for the satisfaction of knowing that I am a clear-headed young man. A fellow can get awfully lonesome picking up technical honors like that."

Actually he is serious about meeting the one girl of his life. He thinks that she will more likely be of the theater than the screen although this is not an absolute requirement. He knows better than to set up qualifications on this sort of matter.

"It's just that the theater seems to absorb a person less completely and permits more time for general living," he says. "In movies each picture that you make takes all your time, a whole hunk of your life, until it is finished."

Yet Farley, when he got back to Hollywood, didn't take an apartment again but a house. And soon afterwards he entertained . . . a group of married couples. He seemed to be studying them and you might imagine that he was trying to visualize himself in the role of a husband. What conclusions he came to nobody knows, but something happened which was rather unfortunate since he is contemplating taking the ultimate plunge.

First he showed everyone around in a group and there were the usual comments. Later he would find himself alone with just one of the husbands or one of the wives. Invariably, he reports, their words were rather wistful. What one fellow said rather sums up what they all said:

"It's a nice place and it's pretty wonderful to have it all alone and do what you want to do. And imagine . . . being able to pick up any time and go where you want to and do what you like."

This set Farley thinking but he is old enough to figure out that it is normal for wedded folk, to look back nostalgically to what they recall as lost liberties of single blessedness. So he doesn't think this will scare him any. It might delay him a bit though.

"But that's all right," he says. "I wasn't in a hurry anyway."

gary crosby of stanford u.

The boy looked surprised. "Are you Jack Benny's daughter?" he asked.

"The very one," Joan smiled.

"I heard you were on the campus," the husky freshman said. "My name's Gary Crosby."

They shook hands heartily as if they hadn't just met, but were old friends long-separated.

"What're you studying, Gary? Mostly football?"

"I'm out for the jayvees," young Crosby admitted, "but I'm taking a kind of business-eco course."

"So am I," Joan Benny said.

She told him she was living at Rable, and he told her he was at Toyan, then Joan stood up. "I've got a class, Gary," she said. "It sure was nice meeting you."

Gary smiled, "The pleasure was all mine."

That afternoon, Gary was boning up on his biology when his three roommates, Bob Hammond of Walla Walla, Wash., Ed Barr of San Diego and Don Wells of Oakland, straggled into room 245 of Toyan Hall.

"Who was that chick I saw you talking to?" one of Gary's roommates asked.

"That was Jack Benny's daughter," Gary admitted. "Not bad, eh?"

"Not bad at all," the roomie agreed. "Why don't you ask her to the Freshman Dance?"

Gary thought for a minute. "She probably has a date already."

Over at Roble Hall, the girls' dormitory, a similar conversation was in progress.

"I met Gary Crosby today," Joan Benny reported to her roommate, a pretty brunete whose real name happens to be Judy Garland. (Not the Judy Garland of motion picture fame whose real name happens to be Frances Gumm.)

"What's he like?" Judy asked.

"He's very nice," Joan began. "Not at all what I expected. I mean I thought he'd be shy, but he spoke right up. He has a terrific personality, and he's out for the football team, and he's really quite. . . ." The telephone buzzer interrupted Joan's conversation and she ran to pick up the receiver. "There's an overseas telephone call for you, Joan."

Joan Benny's 17-year-old heart did a somersault. She knew who was calling from Germany all right. It was Vic Damone, who'd been drafted into the Army and had spent his last furlough at her house.

Talking about the trans-Atlantic call later, Joan said, "It was Vic, and he wanted me to know that he was starting on a tour of Germany with some other soldiers. I guess to entertain the troops. He's a real sweet guy. We write to each other. But it's nothing serious . . . really."

"Since Damone is in Germany," Joan was asked, "and there's nothing serious between you two, what do you think of Gary Crosby?"

"I think he's just terrific," Joan admitted.

This, however, is not the general campus opinion concerning 18-year-old Gary Crosby.

At Stanford, Gary's considered just another freshman, and no one seems impressed by the fact that his father is famous. This suits young Crosby fine, because it would be embarrassing for him to be singled out as a chip off the old Bing or as the kid whose records have sold more than a million copies.

reported for football practice, a couple of sports photographers from San Francisco asked him to pose for some pictures. "Give me a break," Gary said. "You don't want my picture. I haven't done anything to deserve it."

In contrast to the actions of other famous mens' sons, this was a refreshing attitude. Almost at once, Gary was accepted by the other fellows on the squad as a regular guy.

"He didn't make the team," one of the coaches points out, "but he sure worked hard. We had him holding tackling dummies and scrimmaging with the varsity. He was a pretty fair sort of line-backer in in prep school, but this is the big time up here, and the kid just didn't have enough of what it takes. You can never tell, though. Next year he's liable to be a world-beater. What we like most about him is his spirit. He has a lot of fight and a lot of humility, too. In a freshman, that's a good combination."

Gary has reached that point in life where athletics count the most with him and girls the least.

"I like girls," he says, "and I've seen Joan Benny a couple of times, but I just haven't got the time for dating. This is no snap school, you know. I'm carrying a pretty full load, and I've got to keep my grades up. Besides, my Dad keeps phoning three or four times a week. He calls from San Francisco or Pebble Peach or Tahoe, and if I'm not around, he wants to know why.

"During the football season I didn't have a single date—on the level. Dad gave me a 1951 Mercury hardtop and on weekends, I drive over to San Jose and see my brothers. The twins are at Bellarmine, you know. They play football, too."

Bing has always believed in keeping a strong hand on his boys, and in Gary's case, he's been especially vigilant.

Gary's recordings of "Play A Simple Melody" and "Sam's Song" have passed the million mark. More than a hundred requests have been received at the Crosby office for permission to start a Gary Crosby Fan Club, and the youngster has been offered, via his father, fabulous sums for radio and TV appearances. He's also been written up in several national magazines, and Bing has been justifiably worried lest all this go to the youngster's head.

"You let a kid know he's making a little stir in the world," Bing says, "and he can become insufferable overnight. It's a good idea to sit on Gary for a while."

Not that Gary needs it. Another Stanford freshman, who lives at Toyan Hall, speaks for the rest of the boys when he says, "Crosby seems to be a pretty good egg. He doesn't throw his weight around, and we've yet to hear him mention his old man once. He dresses sloppily just like everyone else——denims and sportshirt—and he doesn't talk about Hollywood or the entertainment business at all.

Bob Hammond, one of Gary's roommates, says, "We do so much studying around here that we don't have time for cleaning. Besides, with four guys constantly coming and going, it's hopeless. Crosby's just about as clean as any other. He's easy to room with, never gives any trouble.

"Does he play the trombone? Not that I've seen. He used to play it, I understand, when he was a kid in grade school. But the only thing I've seen him play up here is football. Wait a minute! Last week, his old man sent him a guitar. Told him to start practicing in his spare time.

"Gosh! His old man is strict. I mean he calls Gary practically every night. Really keeps close tabs on the guy. Even if Gary wanted to play around which he doesn't, he wouldn't have much chance. That Bing is a regular old eagle-eye."

Gary, however, is more charitable where his father is concerned. "Dad," he says, "is a pretty nice guy. Just doesn't want me to step out of line."

A review of Gary's educational history reveals he's caused his parents surprisingly little trouble. Bing enrolled him at St. John's Military Academy in Los Angeles when he was a cocky 11, whereupon Gary announced that he was Bing Crosby's son. "You don't have to brag about it," a classmate told him one day. "We know who your father is. So what?"

After that, Gary never again mentioned his Dad in school.

Major Bill Warner and Major John Scanlon, instructors at St. John's, recall Gary as a lad who was always in and out of trouble, but none of it very serious. "He always seemed to have a good excuse," Scanlon says. "For example, if his shoes weren't shined, and he'd been given a detention, he'd bring along a witness to testify that originally his shoes had been shined but that the wind had been blowing very hard and had covered them with dust. He was a lieutenant at one point, I believe, but I think we had to bust him down to private."

Major Warner who coached the football team at St. John's, says, "He developed into a pretty good football player near the end, but we remember him here as a great guardhouse lawyer. That Gary could talk himself out of anything. Persuasive?

John Wayne regards anything but loafing clothes unnecessary torture. Last year when he took off for England, he thought he might need a new suit in formal London, so he called up his tailor. "How's that suit coming along I ordered a few weeks ago?" he inquired.

"Mr. Wayne," he was told, "it wasn't a few weeks ago. It was three years ago. I thought you didn't want it so I sold it."

Kirtley Baskette

He was more than that. We've had all four Crosbys here, and I think Lindsay, the youngest, is probably the sharpest. The twins, Phil and Dennis, are wonderful athletes. But Gary has them all beat when it comes to eloquence. Real good at the blarney, that one."

The twins have caused much more trouble at school than Gary ever has. And family intimates predict that when those two go off to college, Bing will look back upon Gary as a comparative angel.

Physically, Gary resembles his mother more than his Dad, but there is little doubt that he inherited his voice from Bing. Over the phone he sounds very much like him, which pleases Gary no end. He also seems to have developed his father's easy way with a tune. "I've been around singing all my life," he says modestly. "I guess it just comes natural."

Gary never knows when he's going to cut a record with his father or appear on Bing's radio show. It's always during school vacation since Dixie will permit nothing to interfere with her brood's education.

"I'll go down to a rehearsal with Dad," Gary explains, "and the next thing you know we're singing together and cutting a record."

Last Summer just before the Crosby clan took off for Elko where Bing owns the Quarter Circle S ranch, Gary was told he could accompany his father to a recording rehearsal. At the rehearsal, Dave Kapp formerly with Decca, talked Bing into doing two sides with Gary. The record was made in 90 minutes flat, and the Crosby's took off for Nevada.

En route, Gary turned to Bing and said, "How much do you think I'll make from that record?"

"Maybe a few hundred," Bing said. "But only if the public likes it."

To date, Gary Crosby's recordings have earned him a cool $25,000. Gary himself, however, hasn't seen a cent of the money. It's being held in trust for him by Jack O'Melveny, the Crosby lawyer who oversees the basic $200,000 trust fund which Bing and Dixie have given each son.

Gary claims he doesn't need very much money. "I hardly get into town," he says. "Biggest expense outside of tuition, food, and stuff like that, is my car."

Eventually, he may join a fraternity—several houses have shown an unofficial interest in him—but right now, fraternities interest him far less than football.

He very much wants to make the varsity one day and to maintain high academic standards. Bing thinks the second ambition much more valuable, and never fails to impress on Gary that he was sent to college primarily to study.

"If Gary loved books as much as he loved sports," Bing has said on occasion, "He'd wind up a great scholar. Gary's the most serious athlete we have in the family."

Last year he dislocated his shoulder, so vicious was his football tackling, and the Summer before, he refused to talk to his Dad for two days because Bing clowned around while they were playing baseball up at Spokane. "If you want to goof around," Gary yelled at der Bingle, "I'll goof around, but I came out here to play ball."

Off the playing field, Gary is modest almost to the point of retiring. In contrast to his days at St. John's, he doesn't talk very much, and if he pulls a boner, he's the first to acknowledge it.

Gary has been identified with Bing so much that most people forget it was Dixie Crosby who brought him up—and beautifully, too. Dixie imbued him with a good sense of values and the fact that he is regarded as a well-bred, regular, modest young man is a tribute to her maternal ability.

This past summer, just before Gary entered Stanford, he underwent an operation for a shoulder injury. After the operation Dixie took him to Lake Tahoe for a vacation.

"I had more fun with my mom up at Tahoe last summer than I've had in some time," Gary recently told a reporter.

Gary doesn't particularly like the Crosby ranch at Elko since it usually means hard work. Bing pays all his boys cowhand salaries, and the standard rule is: no work, no cash. Two years ago, Gary was given the job of creosoting some fence posts. He fell asleep on the job and some of the ranch posts caught fire. Bing deducted the damage from Gary's pay, and Gary hasn't forgotten it yet.

Like most college freshmen in this troubled world, he feels that sooner or later he will wind up in the armed forces. Until such time however, he plans to keep working and playing. "I'm taking business administration," he says, "but I may end up coaching or even fooling around in show business. My dad and mom don't care just so long as I choose something respectable. They've always wanted me to be happy."

Right now, he's trying to summon up enough courage to phone a certain freshman over at Roble Hall. Her name is Joan Benny, and he strongly hopes that the two of them may have a little more in common than famous fathers.

a life of her own

There were other things that made "Mom" unhappy with her eldest and only daughter. A couple of years before, when Jane was just a skinny, bossy sophomore at Van Nuys High School there was a football hero senior who used to have a curious effect on her. Every time he came near her, as she has said, ". . . . the hair on the back of my head would stand up straight and I'd spit some endearing thing at him like, 'Oh, yeah?'"

Bob Waterfield went on to U.C.L.A. to play on the varsity team and Jane became a senior herself at Van Nuys at which time she wasn't so spindly any more. Her bathing suit felt right at home on her and Bob apparently decided that her sharp manner was perhaps just a cover-up for an eager heart. He came over to her on the beach, that first time, and was so nice to her that she was thrown completely off her guard. Before she knew it she wasn't nipping at him any more! That night she sneaked out of her home for the first time in her life. She and Bob had made a date to meet on the beach again. She wrote her mother a note and said that "the guy way back in my diary" had asked her to go out and that school night or no school night she just had to go.

But there were church nights, too, which he was to cause her to pass up. These were the Sunday evenings when Jane and her mom and her four younger brothers would go to a little church in Sherman Oaks. Bob, now dating her every night he could get away, would know where they were and drive up outside, purposely racing the motor of his cut-down roadster. With each acceleration the deep, unmuffled bark of the exhaust would carry to the ears of the congregation inside, particularly to Jane. Her dark head would drop and she would shift about in her seat uneasily. Her brothers would grin maliciously, and her mother would sit up, disapprovingly rigid.

Sometimes Jane would try to resist temptation, but there were other times, too, times when she had been arguing with her mother about life and about God, and was in a resentful mood. One night, as she heard Bob outside, she turned to her mother and asked, "How long must I continue this farce?"

Her mother, instinctively knowing that she was contending with a spirit as strong as her own, and indeed derived from herself, looked straight ahead as she answered, "You don't have to continue it. I will never ask you to come to church again if you think it is a farce."

Jane sat in silence for a few minutes. Then she got up and walked swiftly to the door. The minister was still talking as she disappeared outside. A moment later, a last spurt of noise came from the car, a thunderous blast that seemed to symbolize the defiance of youth as Jane and Bob sped away . . .

Sped away where? Jane didn't know. She was always speeding away from the "as is" to the "as should be." She was always being pushed by motivations she couldn't understand . . . to break loose from traces that seemed to chafe and bind.

"I don't remember just how," she has said, "but around this time, with the arts and the different viewpoints I came across, atheism crept in. I guess I figured that all the people we were reading, who had gained world-wide recognition, just couldn't be wrong, and that Mom was a little old-fashioned and that the thought of God and Jesus comforted her. But if a person were to be really honest with herself and face facts, she'd plainly see that she could shape her life the way she wanted to. Just be honest . . . that's all."

It wasn't then that she left her home, however. She was still seeking another way. After her graduation she went to visit her grandfather on a lake in the Canadian Rockies. Every afternoon she would row to the middle of the lake and sit there for hours, content just to be there. But her grandfather couldn't understand it. He wanted to take her sightseeing and fishing. Once he told her that he was a little worried about her lack of interest in her future. She could think of no future—except that she must make one for herself, and that before she could begin she must not be treated as a child. She returned to the San Fernando Valley and she talked to her mother.

"We are not a mother and her little girl anymore," she said. "I am a person and you are a person. I must be recognized as such."

Behind these words were many things. She felt restraint, she felt the weight of parental pressure at a time when she herself could not tell which way to turn and wished only to wait and see.

Her mother had repeatedly said that after her children finished high school, the boys were to go to college and Jane to a finishing school. Jane had never had sensational report cards, "except, maybe, that they were sensationally bad." She could always get A's in art, music, and drama, but English was one great big blur. Chemistry, the boys in the class did for her; when she finally passed this subject it was because she faithfully promised never to take it again. Mathematics was just an added hour of drawing as far as she was concerned. She didn't want to go to any finishing school.

And it was then, when her mother said that she was not yet grown up enough to run her own life . . . that Jane left her home.

Her mother knew where she was, yet made no effort to bring her back. Not directly. But she recalls that she prayed like this: "Lord, listen to me. You have been a husband to the husbandless and a father to the fatherless. See over this child, that the harum-scarum not use her for their glory."

With patience she waited for Jane to return. "I was certain she would," she says. "She was not a sinner. She was a girl with strong convictions. She felt she must save herself as an individual even at the risk of losing herself as one of the family."

And those who knew Jane then found it difficult to condemn her for anything but humanness—the kind of human Jane Russell happened to be. And today, hiding nothing about herself, she will tell you she stands before her God, not as an innocent but as a true penitent.

Jane racked her brain with questions while she was away from home. She wrote her thoughts down. "Why was I born?" she wrote. "Was it an accident? What is my purpose or obligation to life . . . to be a good kid and help the world be a better place to live?"

She would balance a joyful event in her own life against a tragic event in the life of someone else. She would think of how she felt in Canada when at last she made up her mind to return home and knew that Bob would be waiting for her. She wasn't allowing herself to think of marriage, yet she wrote then: "The quarterback looked mighty good to me and he even threw his arms around me right on the platform so I knew he was glad to see me, too."

The same girl would also write to herself, "The suffering in India and China makes me want to weep. Ignore it? Enjoy life? Live it to the hilt? Make things happy for the good by being strong-minded and optimistic? Maybe, but I'd get awfully tired trying and I'd have to wear blinders and never look to the right or left—never look at the guy selling pencils. And then what? Then you die—they dig a hole for you and time marches on. No thanks. That thought alone depresses me so much they can dig the hole right now."

Even at the age of 18, she was deeply concerned about all of life. She didn't give voice to it aloud because she hated, more than anything else, the curse of affection. She is uncomfortable today with people who are professionally religious in their attitude. Not long ago she went to an army hospital with a group of church workers who were insistently pious, even to the way they sat, or talked, or held their hands in folded piety. She was so uncomfortable that she notified the leader of the delegation that she simply could not go with them again. At the hospital, as a matter of fact, she spent most of her time in the company of a rough-talking soldier who was emphatic in his rejection of their message of salvation. He offended the other members of the delegation, but Jane thought he was exactly the man they should persevere with. Before the session was over she and the soldier had gone deeply into religion, and if his redemption was not obtained at least his interest in her words was sincere.

This was the sort of girl who had struck out for herself, and these were the thoughts that were crowding her mind. It isn't any wonder that she descended into sickness, both physical and mental. In addition to the worries of the future which surged through her mind, there was the pull of the ties she had broken—her brothers, her mother—and the memory of her father.

She would think of her brothers in a motherly way—the intense yet shy Tom, Kennie so bold and optimistic, Jamie always abrupt but impulsively affectionate as well, and Wally who was even then

LET'S DANCE

One Sunday soon after they'd started to build our house, when just the framing was up, we took a portable radio along and sat on the living room floor like a couple of idiots, listening to record programs. Pat kept turning the knob for "Baby, It's Cold Outside," which was new enough so I'd never heard it. Finally he found it.

"Come on," he said, "let's dance."

"Oh Patrick! People'll see us."

"So they'll see us. We've been living in that blasted apartment, walking on eggs. Every time we breathe, somebody downstairs smacks the ceiling with a broomstick. You're in your own house now. If you can't dance in your own house, where can you dance?"

"Pat, we'll look too silly—"

He reached over and grabbed me, and away we whirled. Next thing we knew, two cars were stopped outside, with people staring—doubtless wondering whether to call the riot squad for a couple of straitjackets. But by that time I didn't care. We went right on dancing.—Mona Freeman.

showing signs of the sophisticated air which was to come to him later. She thought of them mother-wise because she had been in charge of them for so long—all through the illness which weakened her father. And no family was ever closer than they were when, just a few days after a "successful" operation, her father suddenly died. Everyone but her mother had gone to pieces. All the things which had to be attended to, her mother handled. Never did anyone ever see her cry—not until a Sunday morning sometime afterwards when they all went to church and the choir sang a beautiful hymn. The congregation was standing, and her mother just crumpled to her seat and buried her face in her hands. The music now became a background for her sobbing. Yet there was nothing to do but wait. And when she finally stopped and got up, she looked, Jane remembered, as if she had had a good cry on somebody's shoulder. Jane thought she had.

Jane's illness marked the end of her "runaway." She returned home and was not only welcomed, but, as she will always recall gratefully, she was welcomed without any fuss. And it was there, lying in bed at home, looking out at her mother's beautiful garden and up at her towering Eucalyptus trees, that Jane found the Someone she had to find before she could find herself.

She was no longer unsure. When less than two years later, in 1941, her career as an actress began she was ready for it, and as a person who knew her way she moved with sure footing. Not long after this when Bob enlisted she sensed immediately what her role should be in real life. They were married, and though she was beginning to be a name in Hollywood she was even happier to ask for leave from the studio and become just another one of the nation's thousands of army wives.

This was the strength of self and of self-knowledge she got from that Someone she found—about whom she has written: "There was no chance of mistaken identification. He . . . was God." THE END

It's a cozy romance which began last November quite by accident. . . .

Curt Bernhardt, director of The Merry Widow, had signaled the sound man to play a Strauss waltz. He had also ordered Lamas to take Lana in his arms and begin to dance. Fernando executed the orders, but a little too ardently.

"Cut!" Bernhardt called. "Let's do it again. Only this time, Fernando, take it easy."

Fernando grinned, "I'm sorry," he said. He turned to Lana. "I'm really very sorry."

Lana laughed, "Think nothing of it."

So they did the scene again, Fernando behaving like a perfect gentleman, and it was a "take." Bernhardt called a break for lunch and Lana ambled off to her dressing room where two of her friends were waiting.

"Did you catch it?" she asked them.

"What?" one of her friends asked.

"That last scene," Lana said. "The Bull of the Pampas just let himself go. I guess that's the way he treats the girls in Argentine."

The treatment seemed to please Lana who realized now that Fernando was finding her increasingly fascinating. And ever since Bob Topping walked out on her and began to see a lot of June Horne, Jackie Cooper's ex-wife, Lana's ego has been in need of bolstering.

They say that nothing is better for a girl's morale than a romantic Latin lover—and that certainly is what Fernando Lamas is.

He and Lana have been going everywhere together—previews, nightclubs, private parties. Jaded Hollywood skeptics consider the romance studio-inspired, a publicity buildup for Lamas, but seeing these two in action makes you doubt it. Knowing their backgrounds convinces you that it isn't need of publicity, but need of each other that has drawn them together.

Lana fears loneliness, and Fernando fears failure.

FERNANDO LAMAS is in his early thirties. He was born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and was orphaned at the age of five. He was raised by his grandparents and had his first taste of fame when he won the South American free style swimming championship in 1937. After that, he was given a job on radio and eventually got on the stage.

He made 20 films in Buenos Aires before he was brought to Hollywood to complete the Spanish version of a Republic picture. The executives at Republic didn't think too much of his talent; and in view of the fact that he could hardly speak English, he wasn't offered a contract.

His agent, though, knew that L. B. Mayer had a soft spot for singers (in any language) and took him over to MGM. Lamas sang, and Mayer reacted. Although Fernando didn't know what Mayer was talking about, he did understand about signing a contract.

"My first year in Hollywood," Fernando says, "I spent most of my time learning the language, taking lessons, singing at benefits, things like that."

When the studio felt that Fernando was intelligible, he was given a leading role opposite Jane Powell in Rich, Young And Pretty. Then he was cast in The Law And The Lady with Greer Garson. A few months ago he was advanced enough to warrant co-starring with Lana in The Merry Widow.

Fernando has been advised to say nothing about his wife or his South American love-life, and he sticks to this admonition.

However, he does admit having a wife and since she and he are Catholic, a divorce may be out of the question.

Fernando doesn't say much about Lana, either. He sums up the way he feels like this: "most beautiful, talented, and charming woman I have ever met. I think she's wonderful, and I'm very fond of her." All of which is nice but not very informative.

Come right out and ask him: "Are you in love with Miss Turner?" and he says, "But we are still both married."

Lana is much more secure in her fame and much more outspoken. "The Bull of the Pampas is a very nice guy," she says, "and a very good escort. But let me get over the last case of love before I start looking for more trouble. It's enough to say that Fernando and I are just going out for a little companionship."

Lana's friends say that she cares very deeply for a mysterious man at the studio who sends one yellow rose to her dressing room each morning. With the rose comes a card that bears the romantic greeting, "Good morning, Lana!"

Some people say the rose comes from Lamas. Others say it's from Curt Bernhardt. Lana herself refuses to reveal the rose-sender's identity.

Whatever romance there is for her in Hollywood, Lana seems more determined than ever to get away from the west coast.

"In 1952," she's said, "I want to spend a lot of time abroad. I want to go all over Europe. I've got to get out of this town. I was in Europe on my honeymoon, but I wasn't feeling very well, and I didn't have too good a time. Now, I really want to see the place and enjoy myself."

Actually at this point, Lana is the victim of mixed emotions. She's confused and doesn't know quite what to do at this point.

She thinks that getting away from Hollywood will take her away from her problems, but they lie within herself, and will go with her everywhere until she herself, changes.

Lana wants quite frankly to play the field, to date many men and fall in love with none. But in Lana's case this is almost impossible. If she goes out with the same man three or four times, she falls in love with him. That's why so many columnists insist that she has fallen for Fernando Lamas, the man for whom she bounced Cy Howard.

But Lamas looks like a dead end. Religion is the stumbling block.

Thus by going out with Lamas, Lana runs the risk of loving a man who can't control his own marital destiny, a situation that may bring her only heartache.

Lana has the uncanny faculty of falling in love with those gentlemen who can hurt her the most. There is no actress who has suffered more in her search for love. When Lana gives her friendship, she gives it wholeheartedly, she can't help herself. Because she is aware of her impetuous nature, she has tried to make it legally impossible for herself to marry again quickly. Instead of having her lawyers draw up divorce papers she announced that she wanted a legal separation from Topping. "I want some time," she said, "to take it easy, to think things out. Europe would be a good spot. I'd get away from all these hassels and pressures."

With Lamas as her escort she's safe in one respect: He can't talk in terms of marriage.

But what about love and happiness and career—the three most vital factors in Lana's life after the welfare of her daughter, Cheryl?

Lana's career has been foundering ever since 1948. She needs a good picture—maybe The Merry Widow is it. If it isn't, Lana will probably leave MGM. She has been stalling about signing a new contract until the film is released.

It may be that some wealthy lover will come along and marry her. Then Lana would probably give up her career in a jiffy. In her mind, marriage and children have always been more important than film fame, even though three husbands have brought her none of the domestic tranquillity she values so highly.

Maybe some dashing, foreign Romeo will do the trick. It may be Fernando Lamas and it may be someone else. But until she finds the right man, Lana Turner is marking time.

She may mark time for a week or two, but in the months to come when the reports of her European jaunt start filtering back, Lana will not be mentioned alone.

Somehow, wherever Lana Turner is—men of all nationalities appear in droves. Her magnetism, apparently, is universal.

"When I sit with you I feel wonderful . . ." he said.

Then he reached across the table and took her hand. "I love you, Betty. I love you very much."

"I love you, Mario."

"Then we're officially engaged," he announced, triumphantly. And that was all they needed to be promised to each other. No ring, no formal printed announcement, just three little words.

If you travel in movie circles nowadays, you can hear many jealous females comment on how Betty snared Lanza because she knew he was a gold mine.

There isn't a word of truth in that.

"I never really heard Mario sing," Betty says, "that is, listened to his voice attentively, until we were on our honeymoon. Once before, he'd sung at a party, but it was too noisy and I was too excited to pay much attention.

"I would've married him if he'd been a ditch-digger. I married him for his love. Everything else, his voice, his career, his success—all that has been an unexpected surprise. In my eyes Mario doesn't have to sing to be great."

BETTY thought Mario was great the first time she ever met him. That was during the war. She had come out from Chicago to Los Angeles to stay with her sister-in-law. Her brother Bert, who'd worked at 20th Century-Fox, had been drafted and his wife and child were lonely living alone.

Betty wasn't in Los Angeles very long before she decided to take a job with Douglas Aircraft. It was not only the patriotic thing to do, but the salary was pretty good.

In Los Angeles, Betty took some snapshots of his family and sent them to Pvt. Bert Hicks who luckily had been chosen for a small part in the Air Forces show, Winged Victory.

Pvt. Bert Hicks showed some of the snapshots to his buddy, Pvt. Mario Lanza.

Lanza pointed to the girl in one of the photos and being the kind of impetuous, forthright fellow he is, said, "Say, that wife of yours is really built."

Hicks grinned. "That's not my wife, that's my sister."

"Married?" Lanza asked.

Bert shook his head. "Not yet."

"When we hit L. A.," Lanza began, "I think that you should . . ."

Bert Hicks felt that he should, too; so just as soon as the Winged Victory troupe landed in Hollywood, he took Mario Lanza home with him.

"Betty was wearing red slacks and one of those blouses that come down off the shoulder. I looked at her," Mario says, "and I'm telling you, it was really something. We sat down to dinner and her mother was there and I couldn't keep my eyes off her—off Betty, that is. But every now and then, I'd turn to her mother and say, 'Mom, tell Betty to stop staring at me.'"

Betty says, "I guess maybe I did stare at him. But then, Mario isn't the kind of fellow you just look at and forget. He seems to vibrate all over. The first night Bert brought him home, I said to myself, 'Betty, this guy is something special.'"

Not long after, Mario tossed a party at Roméo's in celebration of Bert's birthday. The Army had just paid Mario, so he took his month's salary, pressed it into Roméo's palm and said, "Amigo, for this party the works—cake, champagne, everything."

It was a wonderful, memorable wartime birthday party, and of course, Mario's date was Betty Hicks. After the party they drove downtown and listened to a visiting opera company present Faust. The music did something to Roméo, who had accompanied the party to the opera.

"Listen," he said, "the celebration hasn't lasted long enough. Bert is soon going overseas. The night is still young. I go back and open the restaurant again, and the party continues."

So back went the party. Champagne flowed again. The opera records were restacked on the turntable, and the music began anew. As the record of Enrico Caruso singing Vesti la Giubba came on, Mario suddenly broke out in song. He sang along with the world's greatest tenor and when he finished, his buddies were slapping his back, Roméo was kissing his cheek, and somehow Betty Hicks was in his arms. "I don't know," Mario says, "my arms seemed to belong around her. I held her and kissed her and the sensation was wonderful and in my heart I knew what was happening to Mario Lanza."

The next time he and Betty visited Roméo's, they became engaged. He was 23, and she was 22. They decided to keep the engagement a hush-hush affair until the war was over. "Then," Mario promised, "we'll have a nice church ceremony."

Mario and Betty Lanza are both Catholic, but their first marriage was a civil ceremony in the Beverly Hills court of Judge Charles J. Griffin. The date: Friday, April 13th, 1945. The witnesses: Betty's sister-in-law, Harriet Hicks, and Mario's pal, Al Gordon.

Mario was broke at the time of the marriage so that all he could pay for a wedding band was seven dollars, but even though he earned more than a cool million during 1951, Betty still wears that seven-dollar wedding ring. Mario has offered to replace it half a dozen times but as of this writing Betty still refuses to let it come off her finger.

Like their engagement, the Lanzas' civil marriage ceremony was a quasi-secret affair. Mario simply couldn't tell his religious family that he was going to get married in a City Hall; and yet he wouldn't put off the marriage because of that.

"The church wedding can wait," Mario insisted. He explained that the Army was about to discharge him, he'd signed a recording contract with RCA Victor, another contract with Columbia Concerts; he was scheduled to leave for New York in a few weeks. And he wasn't taking one step out of California without first getting married to Betty Hicks.

"If I go to New York," he said, "you're going with me."

So they were married and Betty went on to Chicago to tell her folks all about it. Mario went on to New York to find an apartment for his bride and to break the news of his marriage to Mama and Papa Cocozza. (As you know, Cocozza is Lanza's family name.)

By the time Betty had arrived from Chicago and they were living together in an hotel, Mario still hadn't told his parents. "You're going to have to tell them some time," Betty said.

"This weekend." Mario promised. "They're coming up from Philadelphia."

When mama and papa arrived, Betty was not in the hotel. She had gone to a movie. When the movie was over, she phoned Mario. "Have you told them?"

Mario's voice boomed over the wires. "Of course, I told them. I told them I married the most wonderful girl in the world. They can't wait to see you. Hurry!"

Betty couldn't wait to see them. In a matter of minutes, she was in Papa Cocozza's arms, and Mama Cocozza was crying with happiness; and everyone was saying yes, the ceremony would have to be performed in a Catholic Church; so they were married again, this time in the Cathedral of St. Columbo.

AFTER a hotel honeymoon, Betty decided that life in the Park Central, while convenient, was also more than the Lanza budget could bear; so the newlyweds moved into an apartment on the third floor front at 8 West 49th Street. This apartment belonged to a friend, Robert Weede of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and overlooked the skating rink at Rockefeller Plaza.

There have been an awful lot of stories to the effect that Betty and Mario Lanza almost starved in New York, they were so poor. It just doesn't happen to be the truth, even though it's romantic.

When Betty and Mario were living on 49th Street, Mario had not only received $3,000 for signing with RCA Victor, but he also had a contract with Columbia Concerts, and he was singing on the radio. He appeared on the Schaeffer Beer program and on the Celanese Hour, "Great Moments in Music." When he gave that up, he formed a trio with George London and Frances Yeend, and this outfit known as the Bel Canto Trio was booked throughout the country.

The assumption that Hollywood discovered Mario Lanza is at odds with the facts. Mario was a singer of stature long before he signed an MGM contract.

He had the courage and the good sense to give up his radio work, however, because he felt his voice needed additional training.

When Mario explained this to Betty, pointing out that voice instruction was expensive and that money would be going out of their household for months, without any coming in, Betty merely smiled and kissed him. "Honey," she said, "you do what's best. Don't worry about me." And never once did Betty complain.

Fortunately when Mario abandoned his radio appearances, he found a sponsor who had faith in his future, a patron who, because he loved music, insisted that Mario must take vocal instruction from Enrico Rosati, the voice teacher who had prepared Benjamino Gigli for the opera.

This patron was a real estate man named Sam Weiler. For 15 months, Sam gave Mario enough money to take care of his household expenses. At the end of 15 months, Enrico Rosati said to Mario, "I have given you polish. Now, go out and get experience, and don't let anyone fool with your voice."

Mario went out on tour. Betty went with him. She served him his coffee in bed the way he liked it at home. She fixed his meals, made him rest, came to understand the singer's temperament.

Mario and the Bel Canto Trio were sensational in Chicago, tremendous in Milwaukee, incomparable in Wheeling. A poster put out by the Lawrence Evans Artist Management which handled Mario in 1947, reads "Entire tour of 60 concerts during 1947-48 sold out. Make early application for your date, Season 1948-49. Available 1949."

When Mario arrived in Los Angeles and L. B. Mayer heard him sing, a motion picture contract was inevitable. But it wasn't the ordinary run of motion picture contract. Mario had talked things over with Betty and insisted on having six months off a year for concert tours. He also wanted all radio and recording rights. Metro started him off at $750 a week and agreed to his terms.

When Zsa Zsa Gabor first had husband George Sanders worried about her becoming a movie actress, Red Skelton remarked, "Tell him he has nothing to worry about."
Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

While touring the country with Mario, Betty became pregnant.

"It was kind of funny the way I told him," Betty recalls. "We were having dinner at Antoine's in New Orleans—just the Weilers and the Lanzas, and the food was wonderful. But somehow it made me sick and Mario said, 'Now, don't argue with me, I know I'm going to be a father.'"

When Colleen was born on December second, Mario was over in Culver City, making That Midnight Kiss. He raced down to the hospital, kissed Betty, then asked to see his daughter. They brought the little girl in. "Her name," Mario announced, "will be Colleen."

Two years later, Betty gave birth to another daughter, and again Mario supplied the name. "Elissa," he declared, "after her grandmother."

What is it like being married to Mario Lanza? Is he really as temperamental as people say? Is he spoiled and pampered? Is he really a genius? Does he like to get away from his home?

These are just a few of the questions people ask Betty Lanza.

"Life with Mario," she explains, "is very wonderful. Somehow, people think he's the kind of tenor who goes around the house screaming and beating his chest. He's nothing of the sort. He loves his home, his wife, his children. He's a real family man.

"He's emotional, of course, but that's part of his heritage just as his gentleness is and

(Continued from page 32) Time was when a young man, wishing to express publicly his honorable intentions, slipped a diamond rock on the third finger of his lady's hand and they called it an engagement and everybody laughed and cried and congratulated the happy couple. It still happens—even in Hollywood. But, nowadays, particularly in Hollywood, the custom has been for the young man to slip into a panic when anybody brings up the matter of honorable intentions. Not that he's against them, of course, he just thinks, generally, that they're his own personal intentions and nobody else's business.

But Hollywood has other ways of discovering just how far a local fellow plans to carry his courtship. Watching his dining habits, oddly enough, is one of them. If he takes his girl trotting around to all the cafes, a different one each night maybe, he's probably very fond of her. But, if he takes her to the same spot each evening, that means it's more serious. And if he has a reserved table each night, and dining with his girl at that table regularly has become a habit, the Hollywood folks know they belong to one another—and they accept that little situation as being as binding as a diamond, as big as a battleship. The only logical follow-up, they know, is a wedding cake some night and the corks popping out of champagne bottles.

If you were to ask Ronnie Reagan if he is going to marry Nancy Davis he'd more than likely grin and tell you a funny story. If you were to ask Nancy, she'd make a joke and then tell you to ask Ronnie—who would tell you another funny story. So the best thing to do is not ask them. Just believe that the Hollywood custom of eating at the same reserved table each night is answer enough—and get a congratulations card ready to send them.

As far as this reporter is concerned, a casting director couldn't pick a more "married" looking couple. And in every other way you can estimate they are perfect for each other.

Ladies first, so let's start with Nancy. She is the daughter of one of Chicago's wealthiest and most socially prominent families. Her father is a famous neurosurgeon. She was reared in strict observance of the niceties of living. She attended the finest schools and when she came out she was one of the most sought after young ladies in the mid-west. She is neither star-struck nor movie-struck. She liked to act and when it came time to choose a profession she took up acting. She was good enough at it to come to Hollywood on her own, with no pull, and to make a name for herself in short order. There is no frivolity in her makeup. Fun, yes, but no nonsense—and any romance she indulges in will be a serious one or very, very short-lived. In total, she is a substantial woman.

If Ronald Reagan wasn't an actor, he would more than likely be the president of the biggest bank in the town in which he lived, or the mayor, or a senator or something important. His background is not as rigid as Nancy's. In his youth, he was a sports announcer on the radio and, when he first came to Hollywood, something of a roof-raiser. But, with marriage—to Jane Wyman—he matured and began to take an active interest in the community life in Hollywood, in politics and, most particularly, in the Screen Actors Guild, of which he is president. Today, he, too, can be called substantial.

It's excellent casting, but if that's all it took to make a marriage, people could pick mates out of telephone books and high school annuals. But Ronald Reagan and Nancy Davis have something else going for them. They're in love.

Away back, three years ago, although it seems like more, they were hanging crepe on Ronald Reagan's heart. His separation from Jane Wyman was one of the biggest shocks Hollywood had received in a long time. There had never been a hint of gossip about either one of them. They seemed the happiest couple in town and, with their two children, Maureen and Michael, the happiest family. Then one day a gossip columnist hit the front pages with the story that they had parted. Because they were both big stars, the press plagued them night and day. Ronnie went into seclusion and Jane wouldn't talk. Then, when a divorce action was filed, Jane said simply—and without doubt, truthfully—that Ronnie's Guild and political activities had caused them to drift so far apart that their marriage couldn't be mended. Unlike most Hollywood divorces there was not the slightest hint of scandal.

But in the months that followed, all Hollywood began to feel sorry for Ronald Reagan. He lived alone, simply, in a small hotel and took all of his meals and minor pleasures in the company of other couples or fellows. No girl, it seemed, would ever get close enough to the Reagan heart to hurt it again.

There is no question about it. Ronnie did carry a torch—for a reasonable period of time. He was a pretty unhappy guy. Then one day he seemed to change. He showed up at one of the strip night clubs with a date—some unknown girl, pretty and good company. He began to see people he had avoided for a long time. He didn't announce it, but he was through mourning and he wanted to get into the normal swim again.

However, there is nothing a gossip columnist hates more than a repaired bleeding heart. If Ronnie was observed at a party laughing while he sat up close to a doll the gossipers would state: "Ronnie Reagan isn't fooling anybody with that gay attitude he effects at parties these evenings. His heart is still breaking for Jane Wyman. Too bad."

At first Ronnie used to complain bitterly about these items to his friends.

"Why," he would cry, "don't they leave me alone? Why won't they believe that I can live a normal life?"

When they didn't leave him alone, he began to make this speech—or similar ones—publicly, with, some people think, rather disastrous effect. The press descended on him as though he had just sawed one of their group in two. They howled—and Ronnie howled back. But whether it was by accident, or design, they stopped talking about Sorrowful Reagan and began printing stories about Ronald Reagan, the foe of the press. Maybe Ronnie laughed about that privately.

Ronald Reagan's courtship of Nancy Davis began so quietly that nobody noticed it at first. Nancy, although one of Metro's brightest hopes, was not very well known and, not being much of a publicity seeker herself, she didn't get her name in the papers very much. She was not interested in any particular man, so she didn't go out often.

One evening, at a Guild board meeting, it developed that there was a temporary vacancy, due to a member's taking a leave of absence. Someone suggested that Nancy might be a good replacement. The board moved that she be called upon to serve—and it was ordered that the Guild president be delegated to ask her.

There are, in the Guild, two girls named Nancy Davis. Faced with this fact the next morning, Ronnie, as President and appointed solicitor, called Nancy's house and the conversation naturally got a little off the usual track. Not wanting to ask the wrong Miss Davis to serve, Ronnie had to ask a number of pretty personal questions, so that by the time the conversation was over there had been quite a bit of laughter. Both Nancy and Ronnie enjoyed it and before hanging up, Ronnie suggested that they really ought to get together and meet personally. Nancy agreed. They had dinner that night—and have had it together nearly every night since.

At first, not wanting to bring the gossipers down on his head with more questions, Nancy and Ronnie did things his way. They ate in out-of-the-way places and steered clear of the night clubs. The Bill Holdens, Ronnie's close friends, approved of the whole business and, it is supposed, encouraged it. Then, after a few weeks of steady dating, Ronnie took Nancy out to a well known cafe. Nobody seemed to pay any attention, so he did it again—and before Hollywood knew it, everyone was used to seeing Ronnie Reagan and Nancy Davis together.

When the gossipers did get wise to the fact that Ronnie had a steady girl friend they almost scared him away. All of a sudden they began to print stories of a coming marriage—all at once. Ronnie, as anyone who talked to him about it at that time well knows, was scared to death. He had honestly never even thought of marriage—and when he did, it terrified him. It is a matter of record that, although he seldom even looked at another girl, he tried to get the studio publicity people to link his name with other women—any other women—to stop the marriage talk.

When Nancy was questioned at that time, she didn't know what to say. She was in love with Ronnie and quite possibly knew she would someday marry him, but she didn't want to have her hopes set up in type. She hemmed and hawed, because she's not very good at lying, and the reporters interpreted her answers as they best suited them. For a time it looked as though it would spoil everything. But, thank heaven, it didn't.

It was just about a year ago that Ronnie and Nancy apparently decided they were going to ignore the papers and live their lives the way they wanted to, make their own decisions and their own announcements—at a time of their own choice. Nancy began to look after Ronnie, more than just a casual girl friend would. She spent as much time as she could out at his valley horse ranch, working, and she'd go home at night dog tired but happy. Although she had never had much experience with rural matters, she began to study the care and breeding of horses and soon became quite an authority on the subject.

And it was about a year ago that Ronnie began treating Nancy like his only girl. It was then that he started that table every night at Chasens.

At the present time, Nancy Davis lives in a small apartment in Westwood. She furnished it before she met Ronnie, but they say she has been changing pieces, pieces that wouldn't look just right in a big ranch-type house. Ronnie lives in a larger apartment just north of Hollywood, and people who visit it pretty often say that he seems to have lost all interest in decorating it. For a time he had big plans. Changes he was going to make that would turn his place into a real bachelor's haven. But the plans have been forgotten.

I've been living in Hollywood long enough to know that the Chamber of Commerce is embarrassed about the weather. Fact is—if you see an Angelino with a beautiful tan, it's not sunburn—it's rust!"
Victor Borge on the Victor Borge TV Show

One of the things that may have made Ronald Reagan decide that this was love was an illness that Nancy had just about a year ago. It was nothing serious, but for a time it looked as though it might be—and Nancy had to go back to Chicago where her dad had the finest specialists check her and treat her. Before she left, she was cheerful, but plainly a bit scared. She had nobody to talk to in Hollywood, really, but Ronnie—and as fast as he could get away from the sound stages at the end of the day he would be over at Nancy's apartment to cheer her up.

When she was east, he talked to her on the phone every night and it might have been then that he realized he would miss her more than he could bear if she ever left him. At any rate, when she came back, well and no longer concerned, he hardly let her out of his sight.

There are other things, beyond the obvious, that Ronnie Reagan and Nancy Davis have in common. Besides having a strong sense of civic duty, they are spiritually attuned. Ronnie is a devout young man, believing deeply in his faith—and Nancy is very much the same. Although they don't attend church as much as either of them think they should, they both feel that it gives them a cleaner outlook to cleave to a religious belief.

Another thing that Nancy and Ronnie have in common is their love for children—and this is very important. The future Mrs. Ronald Reagan will have to be a good mother, for there is nothing more important to Ronnie than his two kids. It would not be fair to say that Ronnie put Nancy through a test in this matter, but it is true that she had to win her way into Maureen's and Mike's hearts on her own. When she first met them, never having been married and, of course, childless, Nancy was rather terrified of two husky healthy off-spring of the man she loved. But she soon found out what they were interested in—and made it her business to learn about these things.

At first it was horses. Nancy came through the horse stage with flying colors. She began to ride, badly at first, but later regularly and excellently. The kids admired this and Nancy scored one. Then it was animal husbandry in general. This, of course, has to do with caring for animals and cleaning sheds and barns. Nancy soon proved herself a quite capable hand at these chores—and scored two. Probably the most severe test for Nancy, however, was the fidelity test. To Maureen and Mike, as to most kids, their Dad was the boss man of the universe—and what he said went. That wasn't too hard for Nancy to go along with, for it is certain that she feels the same way about her man. But anyway, when the kids had time to observe that Nancy could take orders and execute them without mutiny she was in.

"Mr. and Mrs. Ronald Reagan" is something Hollywood never expected to see above a doorbell again, but that is in the past. The man who acted like a man during his sorrowful time of divorce, and who carried his head high when he was deeply hurt, is a whole man again—able to have a family and home once more.

So, the next time you are in Hollywood, and the dusk is beginning to settle and the lights come on, drive down Beverly Boulevard and stop at Dave Chasen's fancy restaurant. Drop in and stand in the crowd that waits for tables, and when Ronnie Reagan and Nancy Davis walk in through the crowd and over to their accustomed place, don't just say you saw a couple of movie stars. Say you saw Ronnie Reagan and his Nancy—and when you saw her she was wearing a diamond ring as big as the top of a cafe table. THE END anything you can do . . .

(Continued from page 57) Bill Holden would have a mallet in his hand by nightfall. It is a friendly contest that includes all endeavor, but it is a real and earnest contest.

It wasn't too friendly at the beginning, though. That was before the war. Bill Holden, a youngster from Pasadena, had skipped into the movies through the back door. Columbia Studio had been searching for a Golden Boy, to play the title role in a picture of that name. The director wanted an unknown and the search for a lad with the physique of a prizefighter and the sensitive face of a violin prodigy had covered the country. Then someone brought in Bill Holden from Pasadena—and overnight he was a star.

Columbia, in those days, was not too well populated with stars and before long, Bill, although not in the big money, was one of the top personalities on the lot and was being assigned the choice young leading man roles.

The way those who remember tell it, Bill began noticing a tall, good-looking young fellow earnestly trotting about the studio grounds almost every day. He was quiet, self-effacing and kept strictly to himself. Bill was a mixer and the silent fellow bothered him. One day he decided to find out who the man was. During lunch he turned to an associate producer sitting next to him. He pointed out the stranger across the room.

"Say," he said, "who is that fellow?"

"His name's Glenn Ford," said the producer.

"What's he doing here?" Bill asked. "Every time I turn around I see him. Almost like he's following me."

"Maybe he is," said the producer. "He's an actor—and the company hired him to replace you, anytime you can't make a part or kick up your heels."

"To replace me?" howled Holden. "Why, the scavenger! He's like a ghoul!"

For the next few months Glenn Ford paid little attention to anyone he didn't have to do business with. He made pictures, some of them that Bill Holden thought he might have played if Glenn hadn't been around. There were B pictures, but some good ones. A Blondie, a thing called Babies For Sale and, finally, a good one, So Ends Our Night, with Fredric March and Margaret Sullavan. Holden watched the young man's career with extreme anxiety.

One day Holden was called into the front office.

"We have a fine script for you, Bill," he was told. "A real great outdoors yarn called Texas."

"Good," said Bill. "What's the story?"

"Well, there are two young fellows," said the executive, "who are after the same girl, and . . ."

"Who's the other young fellow?" Bill interrupted.

"He's right outside in the other office," said the executive. "Like you to meet him." He pushed a buzzer and Glenn Ford—the other young fellow—walked in.

There was a handshake, quiet "Gladtameecha's" and Bill Holden and Glenn Ford became friendly, but eternal enemies.

During the shooting of Texas, the entire production company was in a panic. If a scene called for Glenn to ride up to a hitching post, dismount and walk through a saloon door, Glenn would arrive at the post like a jet plane, leap off the horse and land ten feet away and charge through the door without bothering to open it—while Bill sweated on the sidelines and muttered "Ham!" And if Bill was supposed to stage a quiet battle with two or three of a room full of stunt men, he would ignore his instructions and, quickly polishing off his assigned targets, would wade into everyone else in the room. There were some who thought they'd never live through the picture.

But something more than the birth of a rivalry started during the shooting of Texas. Bill Holden and Glenn Ford slowly developed a profound respect for one another, and by the time the film was completed they were fast friends. From that day to this they will try to top each other in anything, but one will not stand by and listen to a word spoken against the other.

The war interrupted their competition for awhile. Bill went into the Army and a few days later Glenn dropped by the studio to announce that he had enlisted as a private in the Marine Corps. It has to be admitted that Bill got the rank. He became a Lieutenant, while Glenn remained an enlisted man, but Glenn was always quick to explain that any enlisted man in the Marines was better than any two officers in any other branch of the service.

Back in civies, Bill and Glenn were immediately thrown back into their old competitive life. Again they were informed by Columbia that they were to be co-starred in a Western called The Man From Colorado. They appeared together in the office of Harry Cohn, Columbia's head man, for a script reading. When it was over, the boss asked them what they thought. The boys agreed it was fine. Mr. Cohn asked them which roles they thought they were best suited for. Bill looked at Glenn and grinned.

"I'll tell you what, Harry," he said. "I'll flip Ford to see who plays what."

And, although it is probably the only time in the history of pictures that casting has been handled that way, that is how the roles were handed out.

A few weeks before The Man From Colorado was due to start, Holden dropped into the office of a friend at Paramount and with a sly grin confided that he was about to show Ford up but good.

"The guy is out of condition," Bill said gleefully. "He's as soft as mush. I just signed up with a gym in the valley and I'm getting out every morning at five for a couple of hours ride. When the picture starts, I'll make him look like a bum."

Two weeks later he dropped by the same man's office, this time in a rage.

"Do you know what I just found out about that dirty rat Ford?" he cried. "He's been riding every day and working out with bar bells. He's figuring on making me look like a jerk in the picture."

When the picture started, it was a thing to behold—the two muscle men vying with one another to break their own necks. In a burst of enthusiasm, during a fight scene one day, Glenn picked a 180-pound stunt man right off his feet and flung him across a bar at a bunch of extras. Holden was goggle-eyed and mortified that he hadn't thought of it first.

It might be well to state here that neither Glenn nor Bill are what you would call actorish actors. They are not the least bit hammy, are both substantial family men, serious citizens and active in Hollywood community life. They have the usual number of rabid fans, but serious students of good acting are also among the active members of their fan clubs. Looking over the list you will find a good many celebrities, from Mickey Rooney and Joan Crawford to Thomas Mitchell and Jean Gabin. Their jousting, then, is not at all an expression of professional jealousy, but a running gag that has lasted and taken on a serious note.

Glenn Ford would rather swindle Bill Holden out of a dime than find a hundred dollars. He once let Bill sell him an old saddle, properly reluctant to buy, of course, for $25. Bill could hardly wait until he got home to tell Brenda how he had clipped Glenn on the saddle sale.

"And so," he wound up his tale all out of breath, "I dumped the thing in the back of his car and made him give me this check for it—so he couldn't change his mind."

He showed the check proudly. Brenda's face fell.

"You're probably going to want a divorce," she said.

"What for?" asked Bill.

Brenda took him out to the garage where the saddle was perched atop a saw horse. Bill's eyes bugged.

"You didn't let him return it, did you?" he howled.

"No," said Brenda sadly. "He came by a while ago and I bought it from him for you. For $35—and I gave him cash."

The arrogance of the two men becomes so intense at times it almost seems idiotic. They were talking about their kids one day when Glenn casually remarked that his son was three years old.

"No he's not," said Bill, "he's four."

"I guess," said Glenn, "I ought to know how old my own son is. He's three."

"Four," said Holden.

"Three," said Glenn.

"I'll bet you ten bucks he's four," said Holden.

"You've got a bet," said Glenn.

He walked to the phone and called his wife.

"How old is Peter?" he asked. "That's what I thought," he said and hung up. He walked back to Holden.

"Okay, wise guy," he said, "pay up. I just called Ellie and she said he's three."

"I won't pay," said Holden. "You're both wrong. He's four."

Competition really got rough back when Glenn married lovely Eleanor Powell and moved into a swanky house in Beverly Hills. It was on ten acres of ground—and was an admitted show place. Bill, living on a much more modest scale, couldn't stand it. He would come home from work every night and sit for hours and glare at his house. One day he went out into the San Fernando Valley, told a realtor he wanted to buy the biggest house the man could find, and a week or so later invited Glenn and Ellie to dinner in a fabulous $75,000 mansion, which he had purchased from the late Leon Errol. He really couldn't afford it, but he was happy when he saw the look of wonder on Glenn Ford's face.

It was shortly after Bill bought this house that Glenn gave him his finest trimming. They were strolling through the grounds and Bill opened the door of a lath house. Glenn spied a huge stack of boxes containing planting bulbs.

"What you got there, boy?" he asked.

"Some things the former owner was going to plant, I guess," said Bill. "I'm going to throw them out and store gardening tools in here."

Glenn, quite a horticulturist, walked over and examined some of the bulbs.

"Why don't you plant them yourself?" he asked.

"No," said Bill. "That's not my line." And then he got an idea. "Say," he said, "you've got lots of ground, why don't you buy them from me and plant them yourself."

"Well, I don't know," said Glenn. "It would take a lot of hauling to get all those boxes to my house."

"Tell you what I'll do," said Bill; "give me 50 bucks for the lot and I'll deliver them."

"Twenty," said Glenn.

"Okay," said Holden. "Cash."

And then he dashed into the house waving the bill and crowing to Brenda how he had just taken old Glenn Ford for a round 20 bucks.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When I was standing on the corner of Wilshire Boulevard one day, it started to rain. I asked the driver of a car that had stopped for a red light to give me a lift as far as the Brown Derby. The driver said, "O.K., hop in." Imagine my surprise when the woman at the wheel turned out to be Joan Fontaine.

John Becker
Miami Beach
Florida.

A couple of weeks later Glenn called him on the phone.

"By the way," he said, "remember those bulbs you stuck me with?"

"I sure do," gloated Bill. "You ought to get wise to yourself, kid."

"I thought you'd be interested to know," Glenn said, "that I just sold most of them for three thousand dollars. I'm planting a couple of acres with the rest of them."

The blow almost killed Bill, but when, a few months later, some horticultural society came out and inspected Glenn's garden and gave him a first prize, Bill wanted to drive over in the middle of the night and pull every growing thing on the acreage out by the roots.

BILL HOLDEN seldom wears makeup today and it is all due to Glenn Ford. When they were making Texas, years ago, Glenn appeared on the set sans grease paint. Bill noticed it in the second shot. He went to the director.

"Didn't you notice?" he whispered. "That new guy hasn't any makeup on."

"Oh," said the director, "he doesn't wear it. He has a clause in his contract excusing him from it."

"Oh, he has, has he?" said Holden. "Well, I don't like it. I think he's trying to pull something."

"No, he's not," said the director. "He just doesn't like to wear it."

"That's what you think," said Bill. "He's up to something, and I'm not going to let him get away with it. You guys can just wait for me while I go and take my makeup off."

And he did. And he would never wear it again when he worked with Glenn.

Then there was the time that Bill was coming home from Washington on a train, after a few weeks of fancy dining and high living. He learned that the train would pick up a Hal Wallis troupe, including Glenn Ford, at Flagstaff, Arizona. Bill glanced at himself in a mirror and decided he looked a bit bloated. That would never do, he decided. Glenn had been working hard in the sun and would be lean and tanned. So, for 36 hours, while the train sped across the country, Bill worked out. And when the train stopped at Flagstaff, he leaped off the steps to greet Glenn, several pounds lighter and looking like an athlete.

Somebody tipped Glenn off as to what had happened, so he saw to it that Bill was kept on his feet for the rest of the journey. When the train pulled into Los Angeles, they almost had to carry an exhausted Holden to his car.

There is just one place where Bill Holden and Glenn Ford bury the hatchet. Glenn is a member of the board of directors of the Screen Actor's Guild, and Bill is vice president—and at the semi-monthly meeting they are all business. They don't let personalities enter into their official duties. Glenn, as a matter of fact, is very proud of Bill's ability as an administrator and hopes to see him elected president of the Guild one day. However, there is one joke they do have around the big table. Bill has the habit of saying "Jeepers!" when he gets excited—and whenever he does, Glenn looks at him and smiles, and Bill blushes and vows he will never say it again.

Yes, there is a spirit of competition in Hollywood between Glenn Ford and Bill Holden, but they are buddies. They will do anything in the world to top, swindle or rook one another—but it is a closed shop, any outsider who tries to cut in will have both of them on his neck. THE END

liz does it again

(Continued from page 45) Dietrich school of romance since "Grandma" Dietrich was Liz's immediate predecessor. This gave rise to the waggish remark that he must really be in love with Liz since he wore his hair piece all the time for her whereas he only wore it for parties when he was romancing Marlene.

Liz will be free to marry on January 29th. Kay Young, the actress who married Michael in 1937, sued him for divorce on Nov. 15th. Since an English divorce takes only six weeks, Wilding will be back in bachelor's ranks before Liz is free. Liz will be 20 on February 27th and somewhere around these times there's a wedding date in the offing unless they jump the gun and marry over the border. Neither will make a definite admission: Liz talks around the subject while twiddling that enormous sapphire ring and Michael smiles and says: "How can I discuss marriage to Elizabeth when I am not yet free?" The sheer logic of this leaves questioners holding the bag. But word has gone out that Kay Young is all set to marry Douglas Montgomery—one-time Hollywood actor who has lived in England for many years now—so everyone is paired off as satisfactorily as the final act of a French farce.

The fly in the ointment of Liz and Michael's romance in its early days was his marriage. They met three years ago when Liz was in England making a picture with Robert Taylor. Her mother was along and Michael Wilding was working in the same studio. They fell in love when Liz went back to England to make Ivanhoe last summer. As Wilding was married, there was gossip, and so Metro snagged its beauty back to New York for a personal appearance at the Quo Vadis premiere, thinking that would be the end of the matter. But Michael followed her to Hollywood where he took up residence with his old-time pals Stewart Granger and Jean Simmons and successfully pressed his suit. Liz has been a house guest of the Grangers also—she believes in getting to know her fiances at close range. Bill Pawley was the Taylors' guest for a fortnight during that romance and Liz and her mother visited the Pawleys in Florida. At that time Liz told me: "You can't tell too much about your feelings for a man if you're just together at parties. You can think you like somebody terribly much in an atmosphere like that, but it might be just the glamor. When you're around together all day and have a quiet time you find out many important things that show each other's character and disposition."

Liz' publicity has progressed from mice to men with lightning speed. One day she was concerned only with Nibbles her chipmunk, her dogs, cats and horses; the next, she had discovered sex. The gold football which Glenn Davis, All-American West Pointer, gave her as a pledge of his affection moved rapidly in a forward pass to Bill Pawley Jr., to Hilton, to Donen, to Wilding. There was some slight interference from Montgomery Clift, and Bob Taylor's name entered and faded out again from a long list of dazzled boys who managed one or two dates but couldn't catch her interest.

THERE is a threadbare tradition that beauty and brains never go hand in hand. I say threadbare because my experience has often been to the contrary. Liz Taylor can parry questions with the skill of a lawyer. Early in life she learned the advantage of the indirect statement. She knows a denial is easier to wriggle out of than an affirmative answer. Generalizations are a favorite refuge with her and when put to it she can fall back on humor as a quick get-away.

When I asked her about Michael Wilding she was in a negative mood. She had returned from New York where she'd had a lot of publicity about dates with Montgomery Clift and about some hand-holding on back roads she'd done with her ex, Nicky Hilton. But Wilding had arrived in town, the two of them were at the Grangers and there was good reason for questioning.

We began our interview with some discussion about A Place In The Sun and I asked Liz if she thought she'd be up for an Academy Award.

She replied: "Are you kidding, Hedda?"

I said no, I wasn't kidding, that I thought it her best performance: "Didn't you think it was?"

"I liked it," she replied. "And I loved working in the picture. I hope it gets nominated for an award, the picture I mean."

For diplomatic modesty this took the cake: "Aren't you being very modest about it?" I asked.

But Liz said no, that she didn't think she was being modest. And when I asked her how Monty Clift was she came back with:

"He's just fine. You mean when I saw him in New York, don't you?"

"Yes, that's what I mean," I said. "How many dates did you have with him?"

Her answer was nonchalant: "I don't know . . . a few . . . I didn't keep count."

When I intimated there might have been so many dates she'd lost count she quickly corrected me: "No, there weren't many at all." And when I inquired if Clift was more social now than he used to be she told me: "I think he's always been social." "Well, he didn't look that way out here," I said. "Out here he gave a pretty good imitation of a hermit. Nobody ever saw him at premieres or out where there were people."

"I guess he doesn't like night clubs," Liz said with a finality that ended discussion of Monty and his notions. I wanted to know when he was coming back to Hollywood and she tied that answer strictly to business: "When he finds a good script, not before."

So we got around to Michael Wilding, a subject which had been quivering between us from the beginning of the interview. It was the main issue, and one to be handled with kid gloves. I said:

"What do all your male admirers in America think about your dating an Englishman? Aren't they crying 'unfair'?"

"Nobody has said a thing to me about it," said Liz although the columns were full of the fact that Stanley Donen was planning an excursion to Mexico to ease his broken heart.

Fencing became monotonous so I decided to take the bull by the horns: "What has Michael Wilding got that American fellows don't have?"

Liz giggled: "An English accent."

"Is that all?"

"Well . . . he's a man."

"Your American beaus are men, too, aren't they?"

"Uh-huh," said Liz . . . then silence.

"Wilding is older than you. Is there any advantage in going with an older man?"

"I don't think of him as an 'older' man"—her tone put my word older into quotes. "Is he more considerate of you than younger fellows?"

"I don't know. He couldn't be sweeter. He's a wonderful person."

I wanted to know what their common interests were, aside from music, but Liz was vague: "Oh, just common interests—getting fun out of life. I'm having a wonderful time. Right now, I really am."

"More fun than you've ever had before?" I said.

"Yes, I think so," she replied with great certainty. It was tough digging, trying to strike a vein. "Just why do you prefer Michael to all the others?" I asked. "Oh, I like them all," said the diplomat.

We then discussed Stanley Donen—another subject foremost in our minds. Liz knew I had not thought this a good romance for her. She did not know, however, that I had suggested to Metro they could kill two birds with one stone by sending Liz to England to work in Ivanhoe when Deborah Kerr became pregnant and could not do it. I felt they could get a capable replacement in Liz and, at the same time, get her away from Donen to whom she had turned on the rebound of her divorce from Nick Hilton. I asked her: "When did you fall out of love with Stanley Donen?"

"What," cried Liz in amazement, "is all this talk about love?"

"Do you know how you got to England?"

"I flew," Liz said facetiously.

When I told her I was responsible for it, she thanked me prettily and hoped I would like the picture. I asked her if she knew my reasons for getting her into Ivanhoe and explained it was purely to get her away from Donen and she said:

"Why? He's such a wonderful friend."

"I'm as bad as your mother," I explained. "I didn't think he was right for you." I've known this girl since she was a sprout knee high when her mother brought her to my house to sing for me in a piping baby voice. The voice wasn't much but the child was so unbelievably beautiful

Mike Curtiz was sitting alone on the set of a new picture being made and someone said, "You look worried, Mike. What's the trouble?"

"Three things," answered Mike, "the present, past and future."

H. W. Kellick

I knew she was destined to play a big role in life. She started romancing so young that her parents took a hand in things, perhaps not wisely. Her mother did much to break up the Bill Pawley romance. Bill wasn't a millionaire, for one thing, and her mother ambitiously thought her gorgeous child should chalk up a record financially as well as in other ways. By the time Donen entered the picture Liz and her mother were not on speaking terms, so fast had been the romantic pace. She was living in her own bachelor apartment with Peggy Rutledge, a secretary-companion, and was fast becoming a night club figure with the ambitious director. As Donen's wife was in process of divorcing him, he was red-hot in print as Liz's constant escort. He drove her blue car about and friends who dropped in on her informally either found him there, or he telephoned her during their stay. If that isn't romance, Hollywood style, it'll do until the real thing comes along. But to my surprise when I suggested to Liz that she might have married Stanley Donen had she remained here instead of going to England, she said: "Oh no!" very decidedly. I told her I knew I was an interfering old friend but I had her good at heart. This brought out an unsolicited statement: "Hedda, I'm not in love with anybody."

WELL, love was in the air in England as stories of Liz and Michael's romance were the sole topic in the letters my friends had been writing me when she was making Ivanhoe. When her studio brought her back to this country, she pined between dates. In fact her many dates in New York, including those with Nick Hilton, seem to have been for the purpose of keeping her mind busy and off the subject of her absent love. So when Liz made that gratuitous statement "I'm not in love with anybody," (although she was with Michael Wilding at the close range their position as house guests of the Grangers permitted) I looked at it in the logicians way of reasoning: I'm not in love with anybody, I'm in love with somebody, and came to my own conclusions. I suggested to her that perhaps she was just in love with love.

"Maybe that's it," she answered hopefully, dying to get off the subject now that she was losing control of it.

"If you were free now, this minute, would you marry?"

She slipped back into the old generality: "Some day I hope to marry."

"Will you marry in February?" I persisted.

"I doubt it. I'll still be practically married then."

I had the date of her final decree in mind —Jan. 29th—when I said: "You will be free by February?"

"Just," she said, and I could hear the door to her confidence swing closed.

I'd often wondered how this girl felt about her marriage to Nicky Hilton. It had begun so auspiciously. It was the perfect wedding. No one had ever seen such a divinely beautiful bride, such a proud young groom. Back from her European honeymoon floated the tales of her unhappiness—tales of tears and stormy scenes, of a little bride left to sit in a hotel room with a toy poodle while her groom hung over the gaming tables until all hours of the morning. When Liz told it all to a judge seven months after the ceremony, she was wearing one of her trousseau frocks. I wondered then if she wished she'd never left her family roof, never sat in that grey courtroom on a rainy day and told the sordid little story of those seven months while her father, her lawyers, a publicity man and four damp spectators with dripping umbrellas, looked on.

"Have you ever regretted marrying Nicky Hilton?" I asked her.

"I haven't regretted anything I've ever done," was her assured rejoinder.

"Do you think your marriage was a valuable experience?"

"Yes, I do. It helped me a lot."

"In what way?"

"It taught me a lot of things. I learned them early. Maybe it would have been a long time before I learned them . . . it was an unhappy experience . . . I'm sorry it didn't work out."

"Tell me," I said, "if you were advising a young girl, would you advise her to marry when she's 21."

Elizabeth said: "I don't think age has everything to do with it."

When I asked her if she didn't think her youth and inexperience was partly responsible for the breakup of her marriage, she replied:

"I'm sure it was: but I don't think you can put down a rule and say you should marry when you're 21."

During the course of our interview I told Liz I was happy to hear she had made up with her mother and I wanted to know if she had met Wilding. "Yes," Liz said, she met him in England, "when we were making a picture there three years ago." There was a time when her mother was convinced she and her daughter felt and thought as one person. Those were the days when Mrs. Taylor was under salary to Metro as Liz' companion and mentor and supervised her contacts and interviews. So far as I could see there was great rapport between them at that time, evidence of love and complete understanding. Often Mrs. Taylor would speak for her daughter; but Elizabeth did not make all her mother's statements come true. Mrs. Taylor had given an interview in Florida in June of 1949 in which she had dismissed the "friendship" of Glenn Davis as just that, had announced an engagement to young Pawley and allowed the press a peep at a three and a half karat diamond engagement ring, but had prophesied her daughter would not marry Pawley before the following spring. By holidaytime the newspapers were writing about Conrad Hilton Jr. "the new fiance" and Elizabeth was married in the spring, but not to Pawley. She married Hilton instead. Somewhere in between that first announcement about Glenn Davis (incidentally he had sent Liz a necklace of pearls from Korea and was en route to visit her in Miami with an engagement ring in his pocket when the Pawley lightning struck) the minds of mother and daughter moved in opposite directions. The teen-ager who had begun to think of life in terms of specially-built cars and mink coats, had developed such high frequency sex-appeal that reporters were inquiring about Stanley Donen when they crowded around her after she was handed her interlocutory decree.

As a studio property, Elizabeth Taylor has been estimated as worth anywhere from 50 to 100 million dollars to the men who make her pictures. Hers is a face with no bad angles, say cameramen. Billy Grady, Metro's casting director, defines the ingredients for stardom as "a compound of beauty and witchery." Well, Liz Taylor certainly has the beauty. She represents in terms of futures a colossal sum to any studio. Michael Wilding as an excellent actor and man of charm is far more easily replaceable to the men who guide his career.

"Do you think an actor would make you a better husband than a businessman or someone out of the profession?" I asked.

She spoke up quickly: "I don't think it matters what a man's profession is. It's what he is himself that matters."

Like other girls in love, Liz wants children but hasn't thought much about it: "I don't know how many . . . I'm not even thinking about that now, I think it's a little premature."

With her typical modesty she shrugged off my suggestion that Donen is carrying a torch for her. When I suggested that is what people are saying around Hollywood she told me: "Don't believe everything you hear." She says Donen and Michael Wilding have met ("We just ran into each other about town, there was nothing planned.") and that it went off very well.

When I asked her if Michael thought she is a pretty good actress I learned to my surprise that he has never seen the object of his affection on the screen:

"Why don't you take him to see you?"

"I don't want to take him." She had no explanation for this beyond a reiterated: "I just don't want to take him." Liz has seen Michael's work in Lady With A Lamp. I said: "If you went to see his picture why wouldn't you take him to see yours?"

"That was different," she said patiently. "It was a premiere. It's something you have to do. He had to be there so he took me along. Just going to a movie is quite another thing." But Liz finally admitted that Michael has asked to see her in a picture but she's been too busy "having fun" to take him.

I daresay professional beauties grow bored with the steady stream of compliments they must accept and recognize graciously. A girl in such a frame of mind would far rather be told she's "interesting" or "exciting." When I asked her if she found it a disadvantage being one of the most beautiful girls in the world, she said:

"I'm not, so I wouldn't know. Beauty is a matter of individual taste. I think Jean Simmons is the most beautiful girl in this country." When I suggested she and Jean look very much alike she said: "Oh no, I only wish we did." I reminded her that four years ago when she and Jean came to my house they were alike as two peas in a pod and could have passed as sisters since they have the same coloring. Liz agreed about the coloring.

Elizabeth Taylor has never regretted being a movie star. Since she's been in the limelight the greater part of her life, I suppose it would be difficult for her to imagine an existence away from it. But she admits that the fact she is a star might have had something to do with the break-up of her marriage, although she added, "It's hard to tell about that."

When I suggested she'd have to skip across the Atlantic if she married Michael because his work is in England, she reminded me that it was only an "if" and that there was nothing definite about it.

She has one more year to go on her present contract. She has thought about doing a stage play but nothing definite, thinks perhaps motion pictures are not such hard work. And she found making pictures in England no more difficult than here unless you're shooting outdoors when the weather becomes a hazard. "We brought in Ivanhoe under schedule," she told me as evidence of this. She doesn't know if she's good in it because she says, "I haven't seen any of the rushes."

An out-of-town V.I.P., visiting Bob Hope, asked the comedian if he didn't get upset when Bing Crosby topped his gags. "Oh, no," said Bob, "Bing's a good kid. I don't mind his beating me to the paunch!"
Mickey Novak

Although Liz admitted she and Michael and the Grangers had planned a trip to Acapulco she said she expected to spend the Christmas holidays with her family and Michael. During our talk about England we discussed "Little Swallows" the house where she was born. Liz in an impulsive mood, once wanted to buy the entire "Great Swifts" estate but was talked out of it by her advisers. Another time she bought so heavily in the Paris salons she overran her checking account. This girl goes all out when she's interested in anything. She said the Queen of Jugoslavia had her little house now and some Marquis had bought the entire estate she had dreamed of owning. English by birth, Liz loves the country and would be happy to live there: "I've always wanted to go back," she told me.

She would not admit she plans to marry in February but her "I don't imagine so," has no solidity to it. It was a diplomatic murmur by a well-trained actress.

"I bet you'll marry right off, when you're free," I said.

"I might," she conceded, "I don't know, myself, and I'm not going to wager. I'm not a betting woman."

I said: "I'll bet you marry as soon as possible after the 29th. I think you're a gone goose this time."

"You do, huh?"

"Yes, you're in love with love."

"Now that," said Liz, "is my line; I've used it before with you, if you remember."

I said: "I hope you'll be happy when you marry Michael Wilding."

"I'll be sure, this time," Liz said, "I'll know when I marry and I'll be happy."

THE END

does john agar belong in jail? (yes)

Evidence has piled up that John Agar married Shirley Temple, a schoolmate of his sister's, in order to establish himself in the movies. Infected by the movie bug—it is now known that he was batting around Hollywood as early as 1941, trying to gain a toehold in pictures, and that before that he sang in a Chicago night spot—and probably convinced that he himself needed only the right "breaks" (notice how implicitly the Agar family believes in "breaks"), he decided not to wait the long years necessary for even qualified people to get started in films. Considering that everyone who was anyone in pictures, not to mention the Governor of California, attended his wedding, what a smart decision it must have seemed!

On the subject of his marriage, one magazine, "Shirley Temple, 21st Birthday Album, Prepared Under the Direction of Modern Screen," printed the following. The parenthetical comments are mine:

"Suddenly the question of what to do became very important. . . . It had been understood all along that Shirley would continue in pictures (I'll bet it had!) but that Jack would support the family. How? Well, there was always the meat packing business. . . . Now his mother was in the fashionable dress business, his brothers and sisters were on their own. Was it back to school at 24, and with a wife? . . . David Selznick made a couple of moves. (Goody, goody, just what Jackie was angling for!) Mr. and Mrs. of private life became Mr. and Mrs. on the screen."

As soon as Agar achieved the first iota of recognition, he became indifferent to Shirley; but nothing could hide forever the fact that he had nothing to offer. He drank, and still drinks, because he was and is no good; not the other way around. No one HAS to drink. So much for these high-sounding phrases, "compulsion" to drink, failure to understand said "compulsion," "neurosis," "illness." At the time of her divorce Shirley stated that never again would she marry anyone with movie aspirations.

As for the rest of Shirley's testimony, maybe she could have obtained the divorce saying nothing, in accordance with Standard Operational Practice in Hollywood. But why should the unpleasant facts be hushed up? If she has blazed the trail for authentic divorce complaints and truthful reporting, perhaps it will become at least a bit difficult for these leeches to make a farce and travesty of marriage in order to establish themselves in the movies or to dip into someone else's earnings. Justifiable, honest complaints and the interesting change that the truth would make in the "readin' part" of fan magazines would generate more respect and admiration from the public, too. There must be many members thereof who have washed their hands of Hollywood and its product, because of its casual husband and wife shedding.

Having married a child star for the advantages he hoped would accrue to himself, there remains now only one course open to this "boy" (!): to face the fact that he is not an actor, to get a job and go to work at something he can do, like anyone else.

I do not expect to have to thank Modern Screen for $100. The frantic, frenzied efforts of someone, either your magazine, an agent, this "Probation Department" Lloyd Shearer mentions, or person or persons unknown, to rationalize and justify John Agar prove conclusively that only a "boo hoo, poor baby" deal will win this prize; but I am sincerely grateful for the invitation to speak. It's been a pleasure.

Yours very truly,

bang went the strings of her heart

Lattimore arranged for Vittorio to meet Shelley the following night. It was a nice meeting. Shelley was struck by his good looks and he was apparently struck dumb by her charm, but this was partly because he couldn't speak English very well.

Vittorio says, "It was not love at first sight. We are too mature for that. But there was, how you say in English, great rapport between us, great understanding. I look at Shelley. Shelley look at me. We know we get along. Her blonde hair, her eyes, her figure impress me very much. And her personality. So American. What is on her heart she speaks."

That night Vittorio took Shelley to the Pasetto, a restaurant in Rome, and they exchanged autobiographies. Vittorio told her that he'd appeared in 93 stage plays, that he was currently teaching elocution in the Dramatic Academy, that he'd starred with Sylvana Mangano in Bitter Rice, and that he would soon go to Spain to star in a new film, Las Tratas de Blancas (The White Slavers).

Shelley found herself in the relatively strange role of attentive listener. Usually the situation is reversed, but not with Vittorio. His English came slowly. He had to concentrate on every word, and as he spoke, Shelley tried to help him with his limited vocabulary.

In addition to Italian, Vittorio speaks French, German, and Spanish, but Shelley's only language is English, and they had to make that one do.

The following night they began to think they were in love, and there wasn't much talking at all. They dined at the Caballa, a restaurant on the banks of the Tiber River. They danced; they looked into each other's eyes; and then they left the restaurant. Later that night as they walked the streets of Rome, Vittorio told Shelley more of his background. He was born in Genoa of an Italian mother and a German father, he had studied at the dramatic Academy in Rome, he had developed a passion for acting.

He asked Shelley if she'd ever been married, and she told him yes, but it had been one of those hasty war marriages—not nearly a marriage at all—and when the war was over she had been divorced.

Vittorio shook his head a little sadly. It was relatively easy to get a divorce in America, he mused. After all, America was a Protestant country. But in Italy divorce was difficult, almost impossible; a man had to get an annulment.

Shelley looked up at her Vittorio. "Are you married" she asked bleakly.

Vittorio nodded slowly. "Married but separated." And then he told her the whole story. When he was only 20 he met and became infatuated with the daughter of Renzo Ricci, the great Italian actor. They were married very quickly, and two years later, a girl, Paula, was born. But then the marriage began to dissolve. Vittorio and his wife separated, his wife taking custody of the child. Vittorio threw himself into the theater with all his energy. He played stock, Shakespeare, radio, everything. He was drafted into the Italian army just as the war ended.

Since he hadn't fallen in love with any other girl, he saw no reason for starting long, complicated annulment proceedings. "But now," he said to Shelley, "I know I must be free."

When Shelley left Rome, she was wild about Vittorio Gassmann, and the feeling was mutual.

When Shelley reported back to Universal, she was cast in Untamed opposite Joseph Cotten. She tried to concentrate on her work, but Vittorio kept interfering. His letters came regularly.

A few months ago Shelley had imagined herself to be in love with Vince Evans and before that with writer Bill O'Brien, but these affairs paled beside Vittorio.

Finally, Vittorio himself went to the American Consul in Rome and applied for a visitor's visa.

On the application he wrote that Shelley Winters was a friend and business associate and that she would vouch for his financial and moral status, and that under no circumstances would he become a public charge while in the U.S.A.

Then Vittorio bought a round trip ticket on TWA and flew to New York. From New York he flew to Los Angeles and into the arms of his wonderful blonde.

Vittorio stayed in Hollywood for six days, and during those six days, Shelley wouldn't let him out of her sight. She took him on the set with her. She ate with him. She introduced him to her friends, and to most of Hollywood's socialites at the Tyrone Power housewarming. With characteristic frankness she confessed that, "Vittorio is the great love of my life."

How did Vittorio react to all this?

It was his first trip to the United States. It was eventful, exciting, and hectic but he took it in stride. "Tell me," he asked a reporter, "are many girls in America like Shelley?"

The reporter said no, that after Shelley was born, the mold was thrown away. Vittorio looked puzzled, so he and the reporter spent the whole afternoon talking French and Spanish in an effort to understand each other.

Shelley was mildly petulant. "What are those two talking about?" she kept saying. "I don't want them to wander off. Vittorio's liable to say something he shouldn't." Then she'd run up to him and kiss his cheek. "American reporters," she'd explain, "they ask very personal questions. Just talk about your career."

"Do you plan to marry Shelley?" the reporter asked.

Vittorio summoned up most of his English vocabulary. "I do not like even to talk about it," he began, "because when you talk about something very close to you, how you say—sometimes talking destroys the hope."

"But you're in love with her?"

"Si. I'm in love. I love Shelley with all my heart. She has American freshness, but I think European mentality. She has sophisticated view of life."

"When do you plan to get married?"

Vittorio shook his head. He explained that divorce was almost impossible in Italy since the Catholic Church does not recognize it. The only avenue open to him was annulment, which he had already begun to discuss with a lawyer.

"If you marry Shelley," the reporter continued, "will you move to the United States and become an actor here, or will Shelley go back to Italy with you?"

Vittorio smiled. He had spent one week with Shelley in Rome. They had just gotten to know each other, had just fallen in love. They had said very little about marriage. How could he tell truthfully what was going to happen?

"All I know," he explained, "is that I love Shelley and I must return to do a film in Madrid. After that, we see."

At this point, Shelley joined the conversation. "What've you been telling him, darling?" she asked Vittorio. He kissed her. "I have told him that you are a friend and business associate," Vittorio said, and kissed her again.

"Some business," the reporter ad libbed.

"I want you to know," Shelley volunteered, "that Vittorio's going on location with me in Arizona. Then he'll return to Europe. But the minute this picture is over I'm meeting him in Rome."

The reporter said something about the possibility of the studio objecting. After all, she was scheduled for another picture.

"The studio," cried Shelley. "All the time it's the studio. Who cares? Can't you realize that when Vittorio is free I'm going to marry him. This is love, for the first time in my whole life, real love!" She flung her arms around Vittorio's neck, and smacked him soundly on the lips.

A few seconds later, Vittorio turned to the reporter. "Tell me," he said, this time in Spanish, "are there many girls in America like Shelley?"

"If there were," said the reporter, "I wouldn't be standing here." THE END

"somebody loves me"

(Continued from page 63) She'll go after the guy with the ruthless enthusiasm of a predatory pirate. Like when she first met Lew Ayres. She liked him, so she asked him for a date.

And another time, when she saw a handsome man in a Chicago bar, she sent the press agent with her to ask him to join them. She married that one, Ted Briskin, because he seemed so SOLID. He was—in Chicago. Transplanting him to Hollywood weakened his Hutton appeal.

I believe Ted is still in love with Betty. Who wouldn't be? When this baby loves, this baby gives. And she's hard to forget. Even Norman Krasna—he was trying to re-light the fire two weeks before he married Jolson's widow. He met her at a Milton Pickman party, took her home, and was ready to renew. In fact, Betty refused to believe he was married until Norman's partner, Jerry Wald, confirmed it to her. Then she generously wired Norman congratulations.

Betty is the first to admit she is hard to live with. "I'm impossible when I'm working." But when I mentioned this to O'Curran, he gave that confident masculine smile.

So did Robert Sterling, whom Betty was mad for—for a few weeks. And Pete Rugulo. I saw her several times with Bob and Pete at Palm Springs. There was nothing secret about the rendezvous, or Betty's torrid passion for both men. Each was "The most wonderful man I ever met." But a little time and closer inspection proved to Betty that they didn't have what she was looking for—see the top of this story for what. And add, Financial Security. The latter sounds fantastic when you add up Betty's earning power—a quarter of a million dollars a year. But apart from high taxes and expenses, she's never been able to believe in her good fortune: she is waiting for the clock to strike 12, then back to the rags and the pumpkin.

Charles has a good job. Paramount has signed him to a well-paying long-term contract. That's where he met Betty, at Paramount, directing her dance numbers in Somebody Loves Me. Somebody—Krasna—had just loved and left Betty. Norman—I hope Betty won't mind my telling you—reversed the usual procedure, he wasn't sure that Betty was right for him. Betty never talked about it, but this was pure humiliation for the emotional star who was convinced that Norman had all the attributes for the perfect husband—brains, charm, culture, love for her children, and money. I've never seen any woman as hurt as Betty was when Norman reneged and called off the five day engagement. She just naturally fell into O'Curran's anticipatory arms.

They made a romantic rendezvous in Honolulu. Betty went ahead. Charles was to follow after staging some dance numbers at Metro. "But I caught a virus, then had to do another picture. It broke my heart, but I couldn't make the trip," Charles told me, almost in tears. Instead, he met her plane at dawn when she returned, gave her a kiss that shook the airport, took her home and didn't leave her except to work and go home to catch up on sleep. In fact, when someone asked him for his phone number, Charlie said, "And if you can't reach me at home, call me here," and he gave Betty's home phone number.

It was fortunate for Charles that Betty went to Honolulu in the off season. There were positively no attractive male visitors on the islands and local talent was simply terrible. But what would have happened to Charlie if Betty had met another guy she could love in Honolulu?

"I slept ten-and-a-half hours every night," said Betty, disappointedly on her return. She needed the rest, was glad of it. But would have preferred a hot romance, and rushing around. So, when Krasna called her in Honolulu, she was delighted. More so when O'Curran called. And when Charles didn't call she called him, sometimes twice a day. But with no tangible male to make whoop de do, Betty was bored, even though she was able to dispense with sleeping pills for the first time in months. She wasn't looking for tranquillity, but she got pineapples instead of parties. It was healthy, but uninteresting. And so she came home.

There's one thing that bothers me with the Betty-Charles situation. I don't think she will ever be happy while she is in control. Charles is too docile. Betty needs a strong man who will take over. But how many men are strong enough for the assignment? Women, the weaker sex, my eye! I've yet to meet a man with the fight and staying power of a girl like Betty.

But like a lot of career girls I know, Betty operates like a man on the love front. I mean when she gets the man she loses interest. And even when she marries him, Betty still wants the freedom that goes with single blessedness. So it will always take a very unusual character to hold this girl's heart.

The question is, can O'Curran? I was a bit startled when I saw him with Betty at the American In Paris premiere. Charles wore a lace shirt front! I'm told lace fronts are the current rage in England and maybe this kind of elegance is what Betty craves, but I wouldn't bet on it.

What Betty does like about Charles is his lack of jealousy. She had too much of it with Briskin. When he tagged along so unwillingly to Hollywood parties, Ted ruined the fun, always wanting to go home just when Betty was getting into the spirit of things. Nowadays, when Briskin comes to town to see their children, Betty finds a good excuse to be out of town—Palm Springs, Santa Barbara, anywhere, just to avoid taking him to parties. Ted's dates with other girls since the divorce have never fooled Betty. Now he's trying to make her jealous.

But there is an important compliment Betty reserves for Ted—he's a wonderful father. And if only he could have supplied emotional and financial security, this marriage, in spite of his other shortcomings, would still be on.

Sometimes I think Betty only wants a father for the kids, rather than a husband for herself. She'd be willing to sacrifice herself for them but that is the wrong foundation for marriage. And any male worth his manhood would resent the abnormal substitution.

Strange, how capable career girls like Betty still want a man to lean on. I believe Betty would even give up her work if a man came along and said, "Little girl let me take care of you." "I want someone who can support me," Betty has often told me. "I want to feel like a girl. But the kind of men who have the money don't want someone who is as strong as me."

Krasna is the only one of her men who earned more money than Betty, and this was part of his appeal. She didn't want his money, she just didn't want him to want hers! But Norman's biggest hit with Betty was when he told her he adored her daughters. He said he wanted to adopt them and would add a wing to his house for them, that she didn't have to worry, he would take care of them all. So it turns out, he is insecure himself and married millionairess Mrs. Al Jolson!

Betty has always admired "brains" and hoped to marry one. She admits her lack of schooling. She has had to work for a living since she was 14, and one of her dreams still is to graduate from high school. "But what I didn't have myself, I want for my children," Betty states with all her heart and longing in the sentence. "I want the kids to have some roots and tradition." This is one reason why Betty recently made a clean sweep of all the furniture in her rambling house in Brentwood. She sold all the modern pieces, her earlier taste, at auction, and replaced them with beautiful antiques—"the kind of furniture that could have been inherited," says Betty respectfully.

O'Curran speaks Betty's language. The question is, does he speak any others? He's a compliant companion for her, but doesn't reveal any special mental assets in conversation. To date Charlie hasn't bought Betty any expensive gifts. But presents only represent a symbol of security to Betty, and do not weigh as much with the girl he loves as his kindness to her children, five-year-old Lindsay, and three-and-a-half-year-old Candy. He buys them puppets, teaches them dance steps, is gay and gives a "man-in-the-house" atmosphere to mama and daughters.

But even if Betty is now married to Charles, and if not Charles, to another man she believes will be good to have around, the girls will never call him "Daddy." When Briskin read in my column that Krasna wanted to adopt his children, he blew a coast-to-coast gasket, called me to say "He'll have to wait ten years after I'm dead, and not even then."

Now you can see why Betty has problems! But they'll be less if she lowers her sights a trifle. No man has everything, and the only way to get something is to compromise. Betty deserves a good guy. But a girl has to give, too. The best marriage is a partnership. THE END

"What would you say, Mom," he asked, "if I rented a small bachelor deal some place and gave you an extra room?"

Like the truly understanding mother she is, Mrs. Tierney smiled her consent. "Roddie, I always want you to do what will make you happy."

"I think that's it, Mom."

So they kissed and after that Scott called Joe Zboran, his stand-in, and the two fellows met and piled into Scott's convertible. They drove out Sunset Boulevard in the direction of Westwood. On his way to the studio a few weeks before, Scott had seen a group of partly finished apartment buildings in the vicinity. The one that struck his fancy was a job with wrought-iron balconies. Each apartment in the building had its own entrance so that it seemed like a small separate house. In addition, a private patio came with each apartment, and they were all large, sunny, and unfurnished.

Scott left a $20 deposit on a three-room job—living room, bedroom, and kitchen. There was also a terrace that came with the place, and Scott felt this was a necessity because where are your friends going to hang around when the living room gets jammed up?

Apparently, furnishing a home was a subject Scott had been thinking about for some time. In his indirect, half-scoffing manner, he'd been studying homes in Hollywood. The two he admired most belonged to Johnny Darrow and Chuck Walters, the MGM film director. Both places had been decorated by a versatile young designer named Paul Fox.

It so happens that Fox is one of these generous characters who spends his spare time helping his friends furnish their homes. His regular job is chief set director at 20th Century-Fox, where he's been responsible for much tasteful decor, especially in such films as Laura, Elopement, Let's Make It Legal, and half a dozen others.

As soon as he signed his apartment lease, Scott Brady called on Paul Fox.

"Paul," the actor began, "I've just . . ."

Fox held out his hand. "Don't tell me. Let me guess." They surveyed the apartment, and Paul agreed that the simple, open-floor plan would lend itself perfectly to modern furnishings.

"Anything you say is okay with me," Scott said flatly. "I just want you to furnish the place completely. And remember that I'm broke."

In the large main room, Paul used a lot of beige and brown. The carpet, draperies and upholstery are all beige and the wooden pieces are done in natural blond finish so as not to show the dust. Fox believes that a monochrome room is not only basically masculine but much more restful and easier to live in than one that's jumping with color.

He's not completely anti-color, however, which is why the upholstery on the dining room chairs is burnt orange, and a very vivid Braque painting hangs over the couch. Actually the Braque is a copy. It was painted by a studio man who specializes in copying famous art treasures.

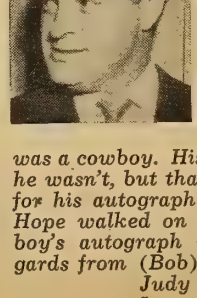
Paul's reason for placing it so conspicuously is because, "Scott instinctively likes good paintings without knowing a thing about art. The room needed one important picture and since the guy couldn't afford an original at this point, I gave him the next best thing, a good reproduction."

"I like the painting," Scott says, "because it isn't too pretty. It also arouses a lot of criticism, and I like to hear what my friends think about it."

Scott also owns several small originals done by a promising local artist named John Morris. He puts on an act of not caring very much about them, and he says he hung them just to fill up wall-space, but the truth is that he chose them because basically they're abstract, and that's the sort of stuff that appeals to him.

HAVING decorated a number of bachelor homes, Paul Fox has some definite opinions about men versus women's taste in home decorating. He thinks men are less afraid to try new ideas and will follow their own predilections in the face of custom and convention. Scott, for example, chose black wrought-iron furniture for the dining room. It's tough and durable and very easy for a bachelor to maintain. And yet, relatively few single girls would approve of iron furniture indoors.

Similarly, Scott's lamp table is a piece of accoustical board set in a wooden frame. This sort of material is normally used to soundproof ceilings, but Scott didn't care. He found it stylish and practical. He also okayed two easy chairs and a foam-rubber couch without arms. "They make sense to me," he says.



Because of the deep yellow bedspread and draperies, he calls the bedroom "My Gold Room," but this doesn't prevent him from tossing his clothes around helter skelter. Brady is the kind of man who just lets his clothes drop off when he heads for bed. He does keep his dresser drawers neat, however. "One of the nicest things about living alone," he points out, "is that there's no one to yell at me."

Just the other evening, Scott had his brothers and a couple of pals in for steaks before the Thursday-Nite poker session got underway. As the boys were sitting around, letting their dinner settle, Eddie observed that the apartment was just about perfect. "This is a pretty nice joint," the kid brother volunteered. "All it needs now is a woman's touch."

Scott shook his head. "Listen, kid," he said. "If there's anything I've learned in this racket, it's to leave well enough alone. Stop being a marriage broker, and go get the chips. You'll find them in the oven." THE END

(You can see Scott Brady now in his latest 20th film, The Model And The Marriage Broker.—Ed.)

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When we were at Paramount Studios collecting autographs, we noticed a small boy collecting the cowboys' autographs. As Bob Hope came out of the studio, the little boy asked his mother if he was a cowboy. His mother replied that he wasn't, but that the boy should ask for his autograph anyway. After Mr. Hope walked on we noticed that the boy's autograph reads: "Kindest regards from (Bob) Hopalong Cassidy."

too hot to handle

(Continued from page 54) 20th Century publicity department a bad case of the whim-whams. She has an utter lack of self-consciousness about her figure and she has a genius for falling into poses which flirt with the Johnston office regulations. Marilyn is perfectly conscious of her conduct in front of a camera. In fact, the five years she spent working as a top pin-up model around Hollywood gives her a big advantage over most of the starlets who are totally incapable of putting one foot in front of the other gracefully until years after they've made their mark on the screen.

Some notice has also been taken of the slinky, undulating way that Marilyn walks, even when she is hurrying across the lot to her dressing room. Secretaries watching her from their office windows might consider this walk a trifle affected. But not the men. From carpenters to top producers—they stop, turn, and watch her as she ambles down the company street.

On the set, Marilyn, with no special effort, attracts the attention of every male. Executives stop to pass the time of day with her. Grips come around frequently to make sure that her chair is comfortable and well situated. Magazine photographers visiting the set invariably make a few candid shots of Marilyn and then stand around talking as long as they possibly can. Quite understandably, this kind of popularity often irritates other women on the set. In fact, it would have taken an icepick to break the chill that existed during the filming of RKO's Clash By Night, which Marilyn recently completed for Jerry Wald and Norman Krasna. People on the set considered it a real talky day when the star, Barbara Stanwyck, said much more than "Good morning" to Marilyn. The most obvious reason: There was always a cluster of people around Marilyn's dressing room every minute of every day.

MARILYN'S tremendous sex appeal would have little meaning in her career if she had no acting ability to accompany it. But even her severest critics admit that she has more than acquitted herself in her first few screen roles. She gave an individual and striking performance in The Asphalt Jungle. In All About Eve, she was the memorable dumb blonde. From all advance reports, her work in Clash By Night promises to back up the overwhelming wave of publicity she has received during the past year. Apparently, her own studio thinks so, too. They've cast her in her first leading role, opposite Dick Widmark, in Don't Bother To Knock, and have plans for giving her a star buildup in 1952. At the moment, they couldn't be worried less about her frank appeal to men. There's plenty of reason to believe that if Marilyn becomes a talented and versatile actress, she will soon command a large feminine audience as well.

In Hollywood, girls seeking a film career achieve recognition in many ways. Marilyn was no overnight wonder. Orphaned when she was still a small child, she was forced to develop a hardy form of self-reliance early in life. She spent her childhood in a series of foster homes, and of necessity, kept most of her dreams to herself. At that time none of them included a film career. It wasn't until she was 17, a divorcee, and one of the busiest models in Hollywood that she thought of acting. As a model, she got lots of comment on her looks, with the advice, "You ought to be in pictures." Pretty soon she started to study dramatics.

By living at the Hollywood Studio Club and keeping her expenses down to the barest essentials, Marilyn was able to join a little theater group. For nearly two years, she paid for her dramatic lessons by doing every photographic modeling job in sight. She also modeled bathing suits, demonstrated merchandise in department store windows, and appeared on an occasional TV show. Even with this whirlwind schedule, Marilyn was unable to keep up with her expenses and for awhile she had to play a running game of hide-and-seek with the finance company in order to hang on to her inexpensive car. To be seen by the right people, Marilyn attended a number of cocktail parties and more than once, she gave the canape table a frightful working over because she was hungry and too broke to eat after she left the party.

Fortunately, Marilyn had a few staunch friends who helped her over these lean days. One of these people was Lillian Burns, drama coach at MGM, who after working with Marilyn for a few months, advanced her small sums to help with her dramatic lessons. Of all the young people Miss Burns has helped over the years, none more completely justified her faith than Marilyn, who began repaying her the week after she signed her contract at 20th. Another true friend was Marilyn's late agent and advisor, Johnny Hyde, who worked hard to get her another break after she had been dropped by Columbia and later, by 20th. When Johnny died last year, Marilyn lost one of the most influential guiding forces in her life.

BECAUSE of her intense preoccupation with learning her craft well, Marilyn frequently is the source of amusement to hardened Hollywoodites. "While Marilyn was over here," says an RKO publicity man, "she went around speaking to everyone with vibrant, pear-shaped tones. I'm sure that if a stranger had overheard her he would have said, 'What a phony blonde!' But actually, she was simply taking advantage of every off-stage opportunity to train her voice in normal conversation."

At the moment, Marilyn is studying the Stanislavsky method of acting, and she is inclined to be a little hammy when she is around people whom she likes and trusts, because she feels they will understand.

There was considerable snickering a few months back when Marilyn began showing up at the studio with volumes of poetry and philosophy tucked under her dainty arm. One day when she toted a heavy edition of Spinoza to work with her, a fellow actor took it from her, hefted it a few times, and cracked, "Isn't that an awfully heavy book to use for balancing on your head, honey?" "What're you doing with that thing—pressing flowers?" was another typical comment. The last thing anyone would have suspected was that she might be reading it. Which indeed she was, with admitted difficulty and little understanding, as a part of the philosophy and literature courses she's taking at UCLA. Marilyn recently told a columnist who asked her about her studies, "I don't mind if people think I'm a dumb blonde, but I dread the thought of being a dumb blonde."

MARILYN'S formal academic education ended when she left high school to marry at the age of 16, and by her own admission, her desire for learning had been pretty listless for a couple of years prior to her marriage. Now that she has won at least a toehold on economic security, Marilyn realizes that she is totally lacking in the cultural knowledge which most people in the movie industry take for granted. During the next two years, she intends to fill this gap in her life with a planned program of courses at U.C.L.A.

Although she is as friendly as a pup with her studio associates, Marilyn is introverted, moody, and withdrawn in her personal life. She rarely goes out on dates or is seen in nightclubs. "I'm just beginning to get my first really good parts," she explains, 'and I don't want to spoil anything."

For the past few months, she's been living in a rented guest house in Beverly Hills, not far from the 20th Century-Fox studios. She gets up early every morning and startles the neighbors by trotting up and down the alley a few times in a pair of old blue jeans and a sweat-shirt. This morning workout, supplementing the rigorous pursuit of her career, is all the exercise Marilyn figures she has to have.

Most evenings she stays home with an album of classical music on her bedside record player and Spinoza propped up on her ample bosom. On nights when heavy reading gets too heavy, Marilyn samples a random handful of the fan mail which arrives at her house by the car-load. The majority of it comes from men and contains countless proposals of marriage, or rapturous eulogies about her beauty. Although Marilyn has been hearing this kind of appreciation most of her adult life, she never tires of it. But Marilyn will never be completely happy until the day she receives a letter which begins, "Dear Miss Monroe: I just saw your picture on the cover of the 'Ladies' Home Journal,' and I would like to tell you . . ."

Her tremendous impact as a man's kind of woman is likely to put that day off for quite some time. But if Marilyn keeps trying, anything can happen. THE END

m. s. party of the year

Right then and there, the party picked up to the tune of jalops and Cadillacs splashing their way to Ciro's front door.

"THAT was a good idea—your framing the Award Citations right at the entrance," Tony Curtis exclaimed. "I think I'll stand next to mine all evening long, and Janet can stand next to hers. Makes a nice family thing of it, don't you think?"

Photographers Bert Parry and Bob Beerman did think, so they took a half dozen pictures. Matter of fact, all together they took more than a half a hundred along with standby, Walt Davis.

No sooner had they finished with two dozen color photos of Ronald Reagan and Nancy Davis, who were obviously not trying to hide the glow they felt toward each other, than the Mitchums arrived.

"Mind if we shoot?" Bert asked Mrs. Bob Mitchum. "Not at all," she exclaimed. "There are really three of us, and I may not be the perfect maternity-dressed wife of 1951, but go ahead anyway." (The baby is due in February.)

The moment June Haver and Dan Dailey arrived a ten-second hush fell over the room while everybody looked and speculated as to whether this might not be Hollywood's most exciting new romance.

June and Dan wouldn't admit a thing. "We're in a picture together," Dan explained "—and who can tell what's going to happen?" Who can? It's hard to say, but all of a sudden columnists stopped mentioning June and that Texas oil millionaire, and for a solid week afterwards, nobody saw Dan in public anywhere without June.

This year's party could certainly have had hearts and flowers as the theme song. Esther Williams, who has barely missed winning the top feminine popularity award three years running now, and by a handful of votes, held hands with her husband, Ben Gage, most of the evening.

Then there was Doris Day, who not only joined the top ten but won a special award as the most popular feminine singer of songs. She was so happy, arriving in the company of her less-than-a-year-husband, Marty Melcher, that she positively outshone the spotlights.

Some of the other "long marrieds" among the younger stars included the John Lunds, the Keenan Wynns, the Larry Parks (whose table was visited by almost everyone who showed up), the Dana Andrews, Van Heflins, Mr. and Mrs. "Reconciled" Jeff Chandlers, the Marshall Thompsons, the Rand Brooks and several dozen others who have conquered the "be a star and and stay married" problem. That die-hard bachelor, Scott Brady, brought with him an exciting new screen discovery, Suzan Ball, who's been working with him at Universal-International. Privately they admitted to friends that they both were "playing the field."

The best comment made about all the lovely girls came from Edgar Bergen whose wife is so beautiful she almost breaks the law. Said Edgar, "I'm glad I left Charlie McCarthy home. It isn't that the rain would swell his joints. I just know he'd sprain his wooden neck trying to ogle all the girls at once."

Nobody voted for the most handsome guy at the party, but you readers would have had a tough time deciding between those newcomers, Rock Hudson (who spent most of his evening talking to Joyce Holden) and Dale Robertson, who this year won the most popular newcomer award. They created almost as much excitement as Gene Autry would have if he and Mrs. Autry had arrived aboard Champion. (Even though they didn't, Gene, in the latest cowboy sartorial splendor, attracted a lot of attention.)

Well sure, there had to be a disappointment or two— Debbie Reynolds, our most popular girl newcomer, was out on personal appearances, and couldn't get home in time. Liz Taylor was heart-throbbing around New York and Mario Lanza was temporarily bedded down with a virus attack. (Although he did rise up on one elbow to accept the most popular male singer award on Louella Parsons' Sunday broadcast.)

There were so many guests we'd like to rave about. Like Ginny Simms, prettier than ever, our always favorite Joan Evans, Ken Tobey, the Pete Hansons, Yvette Dugay, Patricia Ann Harding and her lovely grandma; Joanie Taylor, the Donald O'Connors, and at least 50 others, including those wonderful dancers, Marge and Gower Champion, petite Pier Angeli, Bob Wagner, and the popular columnist, Sid Skolsky. There just isn't space in this issue.

Perhaps Sheilah Graham said it for everyone when she looked around the star-packed room and exclaimed, "One really amazing thing is that in this complete cross-section of Hollywood I don't see one bit of jealousy. Every actor in the world loves to be popular with the public. BUT, when it comes to MODERN SCREEN award time, the losers are always right there, cheering the winners."

And to that, the editors of MODERN SCREEN can only add, "You said it!" and, "Come back next year!" THE END does john agar belong in jail? (no)

(Continued from page 37) the things some people want, but can't obtain. I think this has been the case with John Agar. He is being made an example of. He is the symbol that has been set up to show everyone that the famous can be persecuted as well as the unfamous. The rich can be jailed as well as the poor, and that justice is equal for all.

I have just one thing to say in regard to that. Nuts! If we are going to start prosecuting famous people as examples, why not start with some of the outstanding bad examples of Christian living that reside in the Hollywood district? If we are out "to get" the movie stars because of jealousy or petty thinking, let's start with some of the seven-time divorcees. Let's start with some of the abandoned children's parents. Let's start anywhere that there is a good cause to start. Not with a mere drunken driving charge.

Jail is not a cure for emotional upsets. If so, everyone would have to put in time at one prison or another during their lives. Some of us can face life and its disappointments better than others, and some of us need lots of help from experienced people—doctors, psycho-analysts, etc. Putting an emotionally upset individual into prison because he can't find the right way of life at the time we say he should, can't be the answer to the problem. Especially, when the individual has already made obvious efforts to start on the road to good living.

No, I for one do not think John Agar belongs in jail. Rather, I think he deserves the chance to continue his fight to gain stardom on his own merits, and to gain the happiness of life that should be his. I hope that as soon as this unhappy incident is over, he and Loretta can find that happiness, and that his memory of justice in the United States won't be too black. As for his career, I don't think that the average intelligent movie-goer would ever hold a drunken-driving charge against a fine actor, with a lot of spunk and personality.

Here's wishing John Agar lots of luck and happiness.

Sincerely,
Barbara Archer

there is no jeff chandler

(Continued from page 47) him lies in his analytic, introspective mind. Don't let the camera fool you, he's much more than a handsome hunk of man. In fact, his being so ruggedly tall (six-feet-four) has been a sore spot for him.

"Height and bigness are associated with strength," he says. "If a smaller guy picks on you and you don't accept the challenge, you're yellow. If you lick him, you're a bully. If he licks you, you're a schnook. And I've been taken by smaller guys, particularly when I was much younger and not so well coordinated."

One Saturday night, when Jeff was in summer stock on Long Island, the company went to a restaurant for coffee. The guy who chose to pick on Jeff was of average height. He was also quite tight. He began taunting Jeff for being a "bum actor." "He hadn't even seen the show," Jeff says, "so how did he know?" Jeff didn't want to fight, he doesn't like to, but he was talked into it. He leveled the guy and felt very sick.

The amazing thing about Jeff Chandler is that he began life with one desire—the desire to make the whole world love him. This is, he says, the reason for almost all of his mistakes. It is also why he is an actor.

Now he thinks he's growing up emotionally. He's learning that he can't devote his life to making people like him. Some people will, some won't. "When you try too hard for the love of your fellow man," Jeff says, "you do ridiculous things. You spread yourself so far with emotion that you reach the point of frustration."

Even though he realizes the truth of this, Jeff was devastated by something that happened recently. He was on location at Port Eustis, Virginia, for The Red Ball Express. You know about the demands of a location trip. Up at five-thirty A.M., back after sundown dead beat. So when the switchboard operators at his hotel advised him that calls were pouring in, he told them to use their own discretion about which ones to put through.

Well, one day a letter came to him at the hotel. It was from a girl who said she had tried to call him. All she wanted was to hear his voice on the telephone. That was all. It was little enough, wasn't it, since the letter said, "you mean more to me than anybody"? But she was told he was "too busy," and now she was through with him.

Jeff wanted to call her at once, but her name was not in the telephone book. He wanted to write to her, but there was no return address on the note. It bothered him all during the making of the movie. It still bothers him, because, he said, "she may be losing faith in people. She mustn't. For this reason Jeff answers his own fan mail as much as possible. "I'm way behind," he says, "but I like to do it. I like to put my own stuff down on paper."

He's the brooding kind, the thoughtful type who hurts easily and who doesn't make a move without first thinking it through. Listen to the story of his separation from and his return to Marjorie Hoshelle, the girl he met in 1941. Jeff was appearing in stock at the time. She was in a neighboring company. Five years later, after he had done a four-year stint in the Army, he married her. She is the mother of his two daughters, Jamie, four, and Dana, two.

Marge is tall and good-looking, with skin like a baby's. She is unaffected, intelligent, exuberant. They seemed, as the song writers put it, meant for each other.

Everyone thought they were completely happy until the day a publicity girl at U. I. went out on the set to see Jeff about an interview appointment. He was just sort of wandering around the set. The girl knew that Marge was in New York for a visit. "What do you hear from Marge?" she asked.

"Nothing," Jeff said. "We've separated."

The publicity girl forgot she would have to give the story to the press. She thought only how much she liked these two people. "I'm sorry," she said. Then she added, "But don't do anything hastily. If you've quarrelled or something . . . well, lots of people do . . . but wait a little while."

"It wasn't a quarrel," Jeff said. "It's been coming on a long time."

What causes a separation that has been "coming on for a long time?" It's nothing and it's everything, it's the way two personalities blend or don't blend.

Jeff underplays everything, always fearful of too much talk about a good thing. This isn't Marge's way. When Jeff was given the role of Cochise in Broken Arrow, he knew it might be the turning point of his career. It was a great establishing role. And for Jeff to have the part was Marge's dream, too. Jeff came home and told her very matter-of-factly that he had the part.

"That's marvelous!" she said, spilling over with delight. "What did the director say?"

"He said he thought I'd be good for the part," Jeff told her.

Marge was disappointed. "Was that all?" And then, her enthusiasm returning, "Well, what did you say?"

"I said, 'Thank you.'"

Now this is not a story you tell to the judge. This isn't even one small ground for divorce. But it had to do with conflicting personalities, with Jeff's subconscious guilt because he was an up-coming star and Marge was not. It had to do with Marge's living vicariously through Jeff the career she might have had.

Jeff would come home at night from the studio, upset, maybe. He would sit, meditating, working out the problem. And Marge would ask, "Something wrong?"

"No. Nothing." For Jeff must figure out the deal before he can talk about it.

"Is it anything I've done?"

"No."

It all adds up day by day and the two people separate because they have placed a false interpretation upon the actions of the other.

THEY talked sensibly about the children. Would a divorce hurt them? Jeff was a child of divorce. So was Marge. What scars had his parents' divorce left on Jeff? He tried to analyze it and "didn't know for sure." He knew that he wanted his children to "be as close to normal as possible. Whatever they really need I hope they'll achieve." He and Marge had tried to bring the children up "by the book." But, Jeff said, "Marge and I are not qualified since we don't know where the norm is." He decided that a divorce would not hurt the children. It might change what they were or, rather, what they were to become, but it would not hurt them.

During the seven months Jeff and Marge were separated he saw her and the children often. He helped her move into a new house. And when it came time for the Academy Awards presentation he took her to the big event. He was advised against this. It would, his advisers said, only cause more newspaper comment. The questions would be asked, "Are they back together again?" "If not—why not?" And "What about Ann Sheridan?" But Jeff had been nominated Best Supporting Player for his work in Broken Arrow, and he could not, he said, take anybody but Marge. "She has shared so much with me," he said. "This will mean so much to her—almost more to her than it does to me. I couldn't take anyone else. I want to take her."

Had you met Jeff Chandler during the time he was without Marge you would not have known him for the man he really is. This guy who loves people and wants people to love him dug a hole for himself and crawled in. He lived in his dressing room at the studio—and this was almost symbolic, for it was Jeff's success and the problems encumbent upon it that had come between them. And it was at the studio where he set out to solve his most vital personal problem.

When he needed companionship he sought the company of men. Men like to be with Jeff, they like to talk with him. Howard Duff, Tony Curtis, Gordon MacRae are but a few of his men friends. And then there was Ann Sheridan. In order to understand why she filled a gap in Jeff's life you must understand Ann. She's such a good Joe, ready with laughs, ready with sympathy when needed. She's the kind of girl who talks man's talk to a man. But, except for a few parties which he attended alone, he had no social life.

Jeff had to think it out alone. He had to, as he said, "Get a re-evaluation of everything in my life. It was a period of learning. I could have gone through with a divorce and found a kind of life and achieved a degree of happiness. There is no one direction a life has to go in. But then I began to analyze, to draw the line between need and want. There are many things we want. There are fewer things we need. And the things we need are harder to search out."

And once he had worked this out, alone in a small dressing room in the big studio, he knew what his need was.

He and Marge went to Arrowhead Springs for a three-day celebration. There was something to celebrate. They were back together again. As they were driving toward the Springs Jeff started thinking about something that had happened. He started thinking out a business problem the way he used to before the separation. Marge grew silent, too. And Jeff realized he was doing it again. So he told her what was in his mind. And their getting together again was as simple as that.

Of Marge, Jeff says. "This is a great girl."

There are those who say that the seven months changed Jeff. But that isn't quite true. Actually, they only served to crystallize what he is. In those seven months he put his thoughts all together in one place.

Look into Jeff's eyes and you'll learn a great deal about him. They are sad eyes yet there has been no great tragedy in his life. But he has experienced tragedy since he has the power of empathy. Empathy is, according to the dictionary, "imaginative projection of one's own consciousness into another being." All good actors use this when they are playing a role. But Jeff carries it away from the set with him into life so that he has experienced emotionally much that he has not experienced actually. It is this power that gives him his sympathy for, his understanding of, other human beings.

He has great intellectual curiosity. He says, "I hate the fact that I'm not going to be here forever to watch how every-

CHAIR, I LOVE YOU

While I was pregnant, I went wacky on the subject of furniture. Before that, I'd just buy anything and do it over myself. But suddenly I craved furniture, as some girls crave food. Having nothing to do all those months, I haunted antique shops and fell wildly in love with a certain Windsor chair. The price was awful. I told Pat about it.

"Gosh," said Pat, "that doesn't make sense. And you'll find something else you'll like just as well."

It didn't make sense. But neither did I. Every day I'd go over and just sit in the chair. When I got home from the hospital, there it stood in my room with a big pink bow on it.

"The woman was closing out," said Pat. "Cut the price in half. Said she didn't want anyone else but you to have it."

I've got a definite hunch he'd have bought it anyway!—Mona Freeman thing comes out." He is learning constantly and he wants to learn.

It is interesting to note that people who want to live forever, as Jeff does, do not require much sleep. Jeff does just fine on six hours. No matter how late he goes to bed he is up at seven because, he says, "there are so many things to do." When he and a friend had their own stock company he slept almost not at all from Sunday until Wednesday. They would close a show on Sunday and start preparing for another which meant learning lines, rehearsing, constructing sets and painting scenery. If Jeff managed an hour in bed out of the 24 he was lucky. Marge likes to sleep and needs sleep. This doesn't bother Jeff any more.

He used to have terrible dreams, but those awful nightmares were compensated for by the wonder of waking up. "It's great to wake up from a bad dream," he says. But the bad dreams do not come so often now, which is, of course, part of maturity and security. When his children occasionally cry out in the night he knows what they are experiencing. He knows their fear dreams are a part of every child's insecurity.

JEFF has been doing research on maturity. Take, for example, his angers. He is annoyed with people who do not do a job as well as he thinks it can be done. And that includes anybody—even the children. When Jamie was two and first sat at the table with him and Marge, Jeff expected her to use her knife and fork as well as they did and not to spill anything. He was annoyed when she behaved like anything less than an adult. "But I'm better about that now," Jeff says. "I have learned that she must learn and that I must not impose my adult ideas on her infant mind."

His angers are sudden and explosive even though it takes a lot to get the big man mad. He used to smoulder until the moment his rage caught fire. But unless he could blow his top immediately in front of the person who had made him furious he did not blow his top at all. He could not carry the anger. The difference between then and now is that he does not smoulder. He laughs and admonishes himself, "Forget it."

But the thing that still makes him wild is the person who tells him what he is thinking. "I know what I'm thinking and the other person doesn't. I can't take it when I say something and the other person says, "That isn't what you mean at all."

This really gentle man reacts so violently because this attitude has cost him friendships. (And remember, he's the guy who wants the whole world to love him.) For example, he was talking once to an older friend of whom he was very fond. They were talking about acting. Jeff was trying to explain how he felt. The other man said, "You don't mean that at all. This is how you feel." And he told Jeff how he should feel.

Jeff was burning. "Don't you tell me what I mean and what I don't mean. Just because I'm younger doesn't mean I don't have a mind of my own. A mind of my own and a mind I know." End of friendship. He is sorry about it, but that's how he is and he cannot change. This antipathy is one of his few violences. Marge knows this and never tells him that he may be saying one thing and meaning another.

So much for his angers. His joys? A job well done—whether by himself or by someone else. And the well done job means not only his work on the screen but the job of living a good life. His greatest joy occurs when he has learned something or conquered a fault. The other day he was beaming, "I got real happy today," he said. "The kids did everything I asked them to do not because I, the great big father, commanded, but because I asked them in an appetizing way."

Then there is the case of his procrastination. He understands it and it goes a long way back. His mother was, he says, a "do-nower." She did not nag him, but whatever had to be done had to be done at once. The boy over-reacted by rebellion. As a result if Marge says today, "You know, Jeff, you should fix that window," it puts off the chore by a week. Or he used to. He is learning to control the rebellion. "I bring some humor to bear," he says. "I remember she has asked me because the window needs fixing and not because she's trying to drive me." And this, by the way, is another thing Jeff got straight during the seven months of being alone.

It was for psychological reasons that Jeff wanted to be an actor. It was, he said, "a defense against voids. Maybe I was seeking the love I lost not being with my father when I was a boy. Ninety percent of all actors, I think, use their art as a substitution for something missed earlier."

Success has given him confidence and security. "I'd be a big schnook if I didn't have more confidence now," he says. But success almost had a bad effect on him. "It's a matter of leisure," he explained. "You've got time to think. You have the freedom to think and sometimes that can be bad. When you're not worrying about how to pay the rent you explore—looking for the things you want rather than the things you need. You lose sight of the real values and start believing you're leading an unsatisfactory life."

No, he is not a typical movie star, yet when he walked into the Universal commissary just after he was signed for Sword In The Desert, every woman in the place sat up and took notice. A studio executive recently summed up his appeal. "The women in the audience never feel they can mother Jeff. Women from eight to 80 realize he has sex appeal. But they never think of Jeff as 'my boy.' They think of him as 'my guy'."

You cannot mother Jeff because the core of him is strong. Yet he is not predatory. He is not detached and cold. He is not, actually, sophisticated. He has an inner warmth. He likes more than he dislikes. His and Marge's idea of a good time is to visit and be visited by friends. Lots of friends. He is not in any sense "on the make." He doesn't have to be.

His face belies his character but his voice does not. Listen to the voice and you'll know him. His voice is full of pity and sympathy for mankind. That's Jeff Chandler. It's nice to know he does exist.

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Is it true that MGM threatened to sue June Allyson before she would star in her last picture, Girl In White? What is June's real name, and where was she born? —B. T., New York, N. Y.

A. MGM did threaten to sue Allyson for $280,000. Her real name is Ella Geisman. She was born in the Bronx, New York.

Q. Did June Allyson really play the piano in Too Young To Kiss? If not, who did?—K. C., New Canaan, Conn.

A. Miss Allyson played the piano herself. She plays fairly well and after a week of concentrated coaching was able to perform the stint.

Q. I've been told that Mario Lanza, Gene Kelly, and several other Hollywood stars plan to spend the next 18 months or so in Europe. Why is this? Don't they like the U. S. A.?
—D. O., Philadelphia, Pa.

A. According to a new Federal law, U. S. citizens who reside outside of the country for a minimum of 17 months do not have to pay income tax. Lanza and Kelly both love the U. S., but they'd like to save a little money for their old age.

Q. Why did Warner Brothers cancel Joan Crawford's contract?
—B. O., Miami, Fla.

A. The contract was cancelled by mutual consent. Miss Crawford's pictures haven't been making very much money lately. Warner Brothers paid Miss Crawford $200,000 for the cancellation. She gets $50,000 a year for the next four years.

Q. What are the real names of Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis, and who really runs the act? —D. L., Akron, Ohio

A. Dino Crosetti and Jerome Levitch. Lewis runs the act.

Q. I understand that Stewart Granger fights with nearly all of his directors. Is this true? —C. C., London, Eng.

A. Granger is one of the toughest actors in the business to direct. He argues vehemently with many of his directors. He feels his suggestions will help make the movie a better production.

Q. Does June Haver wear a bra? If so, what size? —J. K., Peoria, Ill.

A. Yes, size 36.

Q. Is Jimmy Stewart a millionaire?
—W. N., Fort Wayne, Ind.

A. Yes.

Q. How long have the Gene Nelsons been married, and was their second child a boy or a girl?
—E. R., Rochester, N. Y.

A. The Nelsons have been married ten years, have one boy, Christopher, four, lost a second son in premature birth.

Q. Isn't the Gregory Peck marriage on the rocks? —B. S., Butte, Mont.

A. Not now—it's just rough going.

Q. Has Paramount offered Margaret Truman half-a-million dollars to sign a contract? —C. C., Washington, D. C.

A. No! Miss Truman has been offered $100,000 for one picture.

Q. Isn't Elizabeth Taylor having contract trouble with her studio and personal trouble with her parents?
A. H., Santa Fe, N. M.

A. Yes, but she's determined to live her own life, solve her own problems.

Q. Who is the most charitable actor in Hollywood?—T. W., Kansas City, Mo

A. There are so many it's hard to name all, but Red Skelton, for one, is up on top.

Q. Why doesn't John Wayne pose for pictures with his four children?
—O. D., Pennsville, N. J.

A. He does.

Q. I understand that Betty Hutton isn't very popular with her fellow employees at Paramount. Is this true? If so, why?
—A. G., Minneapolis, Minn.

A. It's true. Miss Hutton is incredibly ambitious, constantly driving, has never let anyone or anything stand in her way.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

Nebraska's Governor Peterson inducts MGM's Howard Keel, Monica Lewis, Debbie Reynolds and Keenan Wynn into the "Nebraska Navy" after their recent Omaha hospital tour.

At the time that the John Waynes were having trouble a few weeks ago, John very gallantly took all the blame. But those close to the situation feel that Esperanza's continued bad health had something to do with the separation.

The story of the rift broke at a time when both the Waynes were in the hospital. She is in a Los Angeles hospital suffering with flu; John at Scripps Clinic getting a check-up.

As I write this the Waynes are on the verge of a reconciliaton, and perhaps the realization that they were so close to the divorce court may have cleared the air between them. John feels he left his wife too much alone and that is why she consulted Jerry Giesler about a divorce.

But on his side it can be said that he frequently wanted to take her on his long location trips, but she was ill, and too often in the hospials of her native country, Mexico. Just how it will all end I don't know, but I do know John is trying hard to talk his wife out of a divorce.

Although Piper Laurie still wears the ring young Universal-International executive, Charlie Simonelli, flew out from New York to put on her finger—methinks the romance is cooling.

The unhappy part is that the youngsters are still in love. But their religious beliefs are different and in their particular case this is becoming more and more of an insurmountable obstacle.

Piper and the good-looking Italian boy, who manages the New York publicity office of U-I, have decided to give themselves a year to see if their problem will solve itself.

They still talk over the telephone several times a week—Charlie sends her lovely gifts (the latest being a valuable camera)—but Piper, at this writing, is still thinking it over.

Who's Wooin' (subject to change without notice): That cute little Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner are getting serious. Most of Debbie's romances in the past have been along puppy-love lines—but this is different with a big D.

Carleton Carpenter's heartthrob seems to be Barbara Ruick, blonde starlet at 20th. They date several times a week and usually wind up at a favorite spot with Carleton at the piano and Barbara singing and dancing. Carleton's settling down to a steady girl is sure to upset the teen-agers who are real "gone" on him.

Kirk Douglas has it so bad for Elizabeth Threatt that he took her to the luncheon hosted in his honor by the New York models who hopefully (looks like hopelessly) voted him "the most eligible bachelor of the year."

Nancy Sinatra steps out now and then with good looking director Freddie De Cordova.

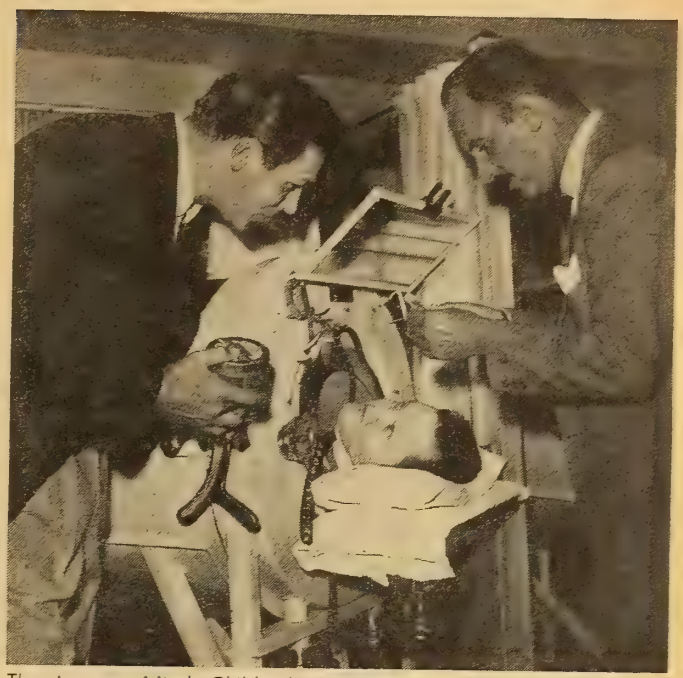
Nancy Davis and Ronald Reagan are so steady they even read newspapers over cafe dinner tables. These two are so companionable and contented together they will surprise the whole town if they don't marry.

Gene Tierney's suit for divorce didn't come as any great surprise to any of us. For months there have been whispers that she and Oleg Cassini, the dress designer, were not getting along. Gene is very close-mouthed where her personal life is concerned. I believe she talked with me as freely as she intends to talk to anyone.

"It's hard for any marriage to survive when two people are separated as much as Oleg and I. When I went to Europe last summer, he promised to fly over. He didn't. When I went to South America to make Way Of A Gaucho he said he would fly there to be with little Tina and me. He did not.

"We have not been together more than three times in a year. That is an impossible situation!"

Gene, who outwardly seems so cool and poised, is far more broken up over the end of her marriage than you might expect from such a self-sufficient girl.



This is the second time Gene has sued Cassini for divorce. Several years ago she filed, and then they secretly reconciled and Gene bore Oleg another daughter, little Tina, who is a beauty. Gene adores the child and is seldom away from her. Their other child, eight-year-old Daria, is ill and has been for many years.

But Tina has been to Europe with Gene and to South America. She is a gay, happy laughing little girl who has the same type of beauty that makes little Liza Minnelli, Judy Garland's daughter, such a very special child.

Now that her marriage has failed, Gene told me she is going to Paris to live. She definitely wants to get away from it all—but time, I think, will change her mind. If there's one thing you cannot do—it's to run away from your troubles. They always catch up with you.

Carleton Carpenter and Monica Lewis get together for some last minute script studying enroute to Omaha Air Base. Other troupers were Jim Backus, Arthur Loew, Mrs. Keenan Wynn and Eileen Christie.

The troupe visited Children's Hospital where Howard Keel and Keenan Wynn stopped to chat with this young patient, who turned out to be a photography fan. Keenan admired his snapshot collection.

By the time you read this—Shelley Winters and Vittorio Gassman, the Italian "love of her life," will probably be married and living happily after an elopement to Mexico.

Their present plans are that Gassman will divorce his wife in Mexico City (she is the Catholic—not he). Then, he and Shelley will be immediately married.

Talk about "love" changing a girl's personality! Shelley is suddenly so subdued and so diffident.

Garbo, herself, couldn't have put on a more aloof act than Miss Winters put on at the airport after she had flown from Hollywood to Rome to meet Vittorio.

She just shook hands with her Latin beau. To reporters covering the momentous event, Shelley sighed sadly, "Please do not ask us personal questions. I am very weary." Then, slightly shrugging her shoulders this usually bombastic gal said, "There is nothing we can say."

Shelley? With nothing to say?

There was a lot of whispering going on when Gloria Grahame appeared wearing a gorgeous ring. I finally tracked her down and asked, "Where did you get that ring, girl?"

She said, "Oh, it is a Christmas present from Stanley Rubin (the director)—but we're not engaged."

Gloria, who was married to Nick Raye, and whose separations from him have been off and on events for a long time, has finally made up her mind at long last that it's off for good.

But the lady says she "can't be engaged because I'm not yet divorced."

She didn't, however, deny that she likes Rubin very, very much and that he is head man in her life.

Gloria's stock as an actress has zoomed overnight since she played the elephant girl in The Greatest Show On Earth.

Scott Brady was fit to be tied over the stories that he had given Joe Cotten such a bad beating for a scene in The Untamed that Joe was temporarily forced out of the picture.

Brady told me, "Everybody looks at me and says 'What do you mean—a big, brawny man like you—beating up an older man like that'?

"The truth is—and anyone on the picture will verify this—that Joe threw his spine out of place when he bent over to lace his boots—and we hadn't even had a rehearsal on the fight scenes when it happened." Okay, Scott—we'll take your word.

The mid-January floods (and I mean they are unusual) brought tragedy, drama, thrills and some laughs to our town. Movie folk who usually confine their conversations to themselves and their career were switched to tale after tale about "my moment in the mud" or "blocked by rocks" or some other hair-raiser.

The most tragic note was the death of handsome Gile Steele, costume designer at MGM, who had won two Academy Awards for his fine artistry. He was drowned when he was trapped in his car after a 15-foot wave of debris washed his car into a torrential ditch. The whole industry mourns the loss of this talented man.

As could be expected, Humphrey Bogart had a field day (if you can call anything so wet by such a term) wading in the flooded streets in front of his home helping push stalled cars and diverting traffic from the danger zones.

Glamor gal Corinne Calvet and her husband, John Bromfield, shoveled a path through four feet of mud against their front door, and stayed up half the night serving hot coffee to stranded and miserable motorists.

Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin were making night scenes on a Paramount stage and Jerry was all over the place putting buckets under places spurting water.

Much damage was done, and many people suffered real privation. Luckily, my house and street in Beverly Hills was not in the path of the raving currents and I feel such deep sympathy for those who suffered loss and discomfort.

The Douglas Fairbanks, Jrs., gave one of the most charming parties of the month honoring Lord Wakehurst, Sir William and Lady Rootes and the new French consul, Count Bertrand.

Mary Lee and Douglas are such warm, cordial hosts with a gift for making all their guests feel like "guests of honor."

Walter Pidgeon, just back from the cold and storms of Iceland and Greenland, told me about the jaunt he and a troupe of entertainers had made to entertain our service men stationed in those spots. He had much to say about the courage of these men, many of them youngsters.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Betty Hutton was right on hand when Charles O'Curran's plane landed in New York. Rumor has Charles all set to be Betty's next mate.

Irene Dunne, in a short rose-colored gown, lived up to her reputation as being one of the world's ten best-dressed women.

It's always a pleasure to see Maureen O'Sullivan Farrow—mother of seven beautiful children—looking like a debutante. This evening she looked younger and lovelier than usual in a filmy, floating white grown.

Gene Markey was my dinner partner and I so much enjoyed listening to him and Lord Wakehurst talking about Australia. Both were there during the war years and Lord Wakehurst is just back from "down under."

PERSONALITY Pointers: Ann Blyth seems to be concentrating intensely on everything said to her. Very flattering. . . . Ginger Rogers taps you lightly on the arm to emphasize a point. . . . Joan Crawford always says "Bless you" before making a departure from a friend. . . . Debbie Reynolds hums softly when she is nervous. . . . Barbara Stanwyck kicks her shoes off immediately upon entering the house and frequently does it at the most formal parties. . . . Marlon Brando bums cigarettes. . . . Jeanne Crain blushes easily turning red right up to the roots of her hair at naughty jokes or if someone compliments her beauty. . . . When Katharine Hepburn is angry she snorts—and I mean snorts. . . . Judy Garland cries at the drop of a hat—even when she's happy. . . . Piper Laurie has a firm, firm handshake for such a young seemingly shy girl. . . . When Zsa Zsa Gabor thinks the spotlight is turning away from her to less interesting subjects she cries out like a child, "Look at me, look at me." . . . When Jane Wyman is deeply touched she makes a wisecrack. . . . Shelley Winters tosses her head in the air when she sees someone she does not like. . . . Even when she's dressed up fit to kill, Janet Leigh curls up in a chair. . . . Tell Mario Lanza something exciting and he hits his thigh and cries, "Zeus!" . . . Spencer Tracy can't stand to be slapped on the back. . . . Susan Hayward will not gossip even when there's a good hot scandal in Hollywood. . . . Paul Douglas keeps his head down and looks up when he talks to you. These characteristics are supposed to be revealing. What do you make of 'em, you amateur psychiatrists?

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Hollywood's ideal couple, Alan and Sue Ladd, recently celebrated their tenth anniversary with the help of Alana, eight, David, five.

BLESS their little home-loving hearts. When Jane Powell and Geary Steffan become landlords in March—their new apartment unit in the Valley will be completed by then—they are instigating a set of rules guaranteed to put blackhearted landlords in a new light.

First, only people with children can rent the apartments.

Second, all the wallpaper will be of washable materials—ditto the coverings on the furniture.

And, in the patio, will be sandboxes, seesaws and junior workout rings and bars!

THE gossips who have been chattering that all is not well betwen Rory Calhoun and Lita Baron should have seen them the night Rory flew home after seven weeks on location in South America.

The scene of the meeting was Ciro's cafe because Lita has been appearing there in an act with dancer Billy Daniel.

Rory walked in right in the middle of the act. He tried to take an inconspicuous table where he wouldn't be spotted before she finished. But Lita saw him, stopped right in the middle of a song, let out a "Whoops!" and jumped from the stage straight into Rory's arms.

THE Letter Box: Jo Ann, of Fort Wayne, Indiana, writes that a whole new generation is growing up which has not seen Gone With The Wind. This teen-ager says, "I've just finished reading the novel and so have many of my girl friends. We'd sure like to see the picture."

Rosalie Morabito, Philadelphia: "MODERN SCREEN is the top movie magazine on my list. But they make the same mistake you do—don't give us enough stories and gossip and chatter about Bing Crosby, the absolute tops man in the entertainment world." (Are you readin', Chuck Saxon?)

All the way from Calcutta, India, "Miss S. R." writes: "My ax is out for all the people who criticize Mario Lanza, that incomparable artist. So he is temperamental? That is a small price to pay for the joy he gives when he opens his mouth and sings straight from heaven! Bravo our new Caruso!"

WHO'S MAD AT WHO:

Bing Crosby refused to make The Road to Bali for Paramount. The reason was simple. He told me, "It's The Road To Zanzibar all over again, and the fans wouldn't like a repeat, would they?" As a substitute, Bing and pal Bill Morrow submitted their own script, The Road To The Moon. It's about a mad scientist who whisks the Groaner and Bob Hope off into the wild blue yonder, and it has a lot of songs that rhyme moon with June. But Para couldn't see it his way. Bing again: "If the studio won't let me do my own, I won't be making movies till next fall!" . . . Anne Baxter got a parking ticket in front of Don Loper's shop. Tried to charm herself out of it but no go . . . Janis Paige plods to New York, after making some not-so-good movies, to chalk up a real triumph as a stage star in Remains To Be Seen. Then MGM buys her play for the screen and talks about starring Debbie Reynolds in the film version! . . . Mercury Records, boiling mad because it lost Frankie Laine to Columbia Records, is pushing a new young singer named Buddy Charles to fill Laine's shoes. Buddy is RKO producer Tom Gries' brother . . . An interior decorator threw up his hands on re-doing the Jennifer Jones-David Selznick home, claiming he was thrown into a nervous tizzy by all the temperament.

FUNNIES:

A star leaned across her table at Ciro's and let slip a real blooper while telling me all about her date: "He's very rich," she said, "and every time he phones me I get chinchillas up and down my spine!" . . . Phyllis Thaxter told me she reprimanded her little girl for using naughty language and not 10 minutes later the youngster asked her what picture she was working in. Phyllis blushed and said, "Retreat Hell!"

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Wyman

Travis Kleefeld, who used to date Irene Wrightsman, helped Jane Wyman celebrate her 38th birthday at Ciro's the night Les Paul and Mary Ford opened there, and we all turned and sang "Happy Birthday, Dear Janie" in Miss W.'s general direction. Kleefeld, now a building contractor, was playing a tuba in the Beverly Hills High School band ten years ago, when Jane was Mrs. Ronald Reagan . . . You gotta take a guy and gal's word. I saw John Payne and Lina Romay acting romantic at LaRue but both denied any big amour, although John admitted she's a "most wonderful girl." Dig that "most." Usually when I press a point the answer is just plain "wonderful girl" . . . Before she took off for Europe, a pal told Janet Leigh 'twould be cold and to take along her long woollies. Janet replied, "I've got my love to keep me warm!" . . . U-I's press agents in London told Tony Curtis to bow from the waist when he met Princess Elizabeth and Prince Phillip, but he forgot and merely gasped, "Hi!"

Curtis

Greg Bautzer gifted Ginger Rogers with a magnificent mink coat, just because she's such a sweetheart . . . Jane Nigh brought Dan Dailey a silk kimono back from her USO tour to Korea . . . Joan Crawford recommended her ex-husband, Franchot Tone, for the second male lead in her next picture, Sudden Fear, although he didn't get it. And Jack Palance was chosen to co-star with Miss C. when they couldn't get Jeff Chandler . . . Carleton Carpenter stepped out on Debbie Reynolds (Continued on page 14) with Joan Evans . . . Mrs. Loyal Davis, Nancy's mother, says it's "just Hollywood gossip" that her daughter will marry Ronnie Reagan. Says Mrs. D.: "They're just good friends and matrimony is a gross exaggeration." Does mother know best in this instance? . . . There are those who say Mike Wilding used to have a big crush on Jean Simmons before she married his pal Stewart Granger, and that's why he's enamoured now of Liz Taylor, who's a little bit like Jeannie in both looks and age . . . Incidentally, Liz wants $5,000 a week, 47 weeks a year, up quite a jump over her present $1,500 weekly, to stay under contract at MGM. She has a few more months to go on her old pact.

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Don't expect U-I to co-star Piper Laurie and Tony Curtis in too many more pictures after they finished Almost Married. These two just don't like to work together! . . . Shelley Gassman. Some name, huh? At press time, Miss Winters' Roman Romeo, Vittorio Gassman, was planning to hop to Mexico when he finishes his current film assignment in Italy, secure a quick divorce, presumably with his wife's okay, and then marry Shelley . . . Did you know Shelley was an extra in Red River, just a few months before she became a star in Ronald Colman's A Double Life? . . . Latin Lovers, in which Lana Turner and Fernando Lamas will re-team after The Merry Widow, is about a Brazilian singer discovered in a Manhattan nightclub by an heiress who makes a star out of him. Fernando sings and is from South America . . . Dale Robertson has written a screenplay about Robert E. Lee, his idol, and is twisting Darryl Zanuck's arm to let him star in it . . . Prediction: Bob Carson, Jack's brother, will go places in Filmdom. He's the ringmaster you liked in The Greatest Show On Earth.

Bob Taylor wasn't planning on rushing into his next marriage when this column was on its way to the printer. Bob, who has been doing the night spots solo (so looooow!), thanked me during a lunch break in the MGM commissary for not printing any of the romantic rumors a lot of other columnists have been falling for. Said Bob: "You just might turn out to be the guy Diogenes was looking for!" . . . This looks like the year that will put Taylor out in front again as the hottest male star in Hollywood. His 1952 releases include Quo Vadis, Westward The Women and Ivanhoe. Remember when Bob was fighting that "too-pretty-for-a-man" tag? . . . And Mario Lanza oughta change his tune from "The Loveliest Night of the Year" to "The Loveliest Year of My Life." He made a mint in '51, and, now that he's down to a slim 185 again, expects to repeat his boxoffice smash in '52 . . . Sue and Alan Ladd caught the photogs offguard, making one of their rare nightclub outings to catch Bill

Are you in the know?

After a dance number, what's your next step?

☐ Thank him and retreat ☐ Do a repeat

As the music stops, 'tween numbers—maybe you're plagued by a passel of doubts. Such as—might Pete prefer the next whirl with some other girl? Should you retreat to Wallflowers' Roost? Or high-sign the stag line? 'Course not! Continue with your partner 'til a gent cuts in. If problem-time doubts beset you, you can vanquish them with Kotex, for those flat pressed ends rout revealing outlines. So prance through the prom undismayed!

When to tell him your dating curfew?

☐ When starting out ☐ Play the waiting game

He planned to top the evening off with a real special eat-treat. But you're due home—as of now! Why wait 'til the hours dwindle down to your dating deadline? Break the curfew news when you're starting out. Likewise, when listing sanitary needs, don't wait 'til calendar time to choose Kotex. And remember, that special safety center gives you extra protection.

Does writing letters help to improve—

☐ Your romance ☐ Your chatter ☐ Knock-knees

Bet this stumped you! Any hoo, you can whittle fat from the inner knee thusly: Lying on back with leg straight up—"write" letters of the alphabet with your big toe. Repeat with other leg. Get plumpish knees in shape for summer playtogs—and for comfort on certain days, get Kotex: the napkin that holds its shape. (Made to stay soft while you wear it!)

If you agree to go steady, should you—

☐ Forsake all others ☐ Try a part-time plan

Accepting his class ring calls for a huddle as to what going steady will mean. No other bookings? H'm-m. You may miss a lot of fun. Why not try a part-time plan—dating him week-ends and for gay-lah doings? To decide what's best for you—when buying Kotex, you need only try all 3 absorbencies. There's Regular, Junior, Super . . . suited to different days.

More women choose KOTEX than all other sanitary napkins

How to prepare for "certain" days?

☐ Circle your calendar ☐ Perk up your wardrobe ☐ Buy a new belt

Before "that" time, be ready! All 3 answers can help. But to assure extra comfort, buy a new Kotex sanitary belt. Made with soft-stretch elastic—this strong, lightweight Kotex belt's non-twisting . . . non-curling. Stays flat even after many washings. Dries pronto! So don't wait 'til the last minute: buy a new Kotex belt now. Why not buy two—for a change!

MacArthur's opening at the Gala. Watch for more news about this young singer.

SEX APPEAL:

Marilyn Monroe arrived an hour early every morning for her role in We're Not Married at 20th. It took a half-hour to squeeze her into the tight bathing suit she wears in the picture and another half-hour to get her past the gawking soundstage crew! . . . Didja know that Marilyn was once under contract to another actor—John Carroll? He saw her playing golf and signed her right there on the fairway . . . Speaking of squeezing, it took both Helen Rose and Walter Plunkett to pour Esther Williams into the wisp she wears in One Piece Bathing Suit. I stood by, just in case, but everything came off okay.

Toughest makeup job of the year: making Anne Francis unattractive for her role in 20th's Dream Boat . . . Is it mere coincidence that Jane Russell lives on ROUND Valley Road? . . . They're talking of releasing Marie Wilson's next picture in Bra-zil . . . Ava G. Sinatra wore a SHORT Gown to the Pandora And The Flying Dutchman preem. Last one she went to, a studio executive stepped on her train . . . And, in true musical comedy tradition, the dance team for the same preem's pre-screening stage show quarreled, left the theater, then kissed and made up just in time to go on! . . . Only star who dressed informally for the Pandora opening was Scott Brady, who wore a gray suit . . . Romance on the wing, same affair: Debbie Reynolds and Dick Anderson . . . And the crowd kept asking Anne Baxter where John Hodiak was.

ODDS BODKINS:

That new ruby ring Lana Turner's wearing is a gift, not from Fernando but from daughter Cheryl, who won it at a radio giveaway show here in Hollywood . . . Lee Garmes, who photographed the biggest scene in screen history—the battle sequence in Gone With The Wind—last month filmed the smallest: Susan Hayward taking a shower in the cramped confines of a house trailer bath for RKO's This Man Is Mine. The set measured 36 inches by 28 inches! . . . Susie, by the way, couldn't find a maid so her lovin' spouse, Jess Barker, minded the kids while she worked in this picture with Bob Mitchum.

Aldo Ray emerges as a new star in The Marrying Kind. And Judy Holliday, who vowed she'd never do it again after Born Yesterday, plays a dumb blonde. . . . A sightseeing company here added the MCA parking lot to its schedule. You can hear the barkers shouting: "And on your right is the parking lot where Walter Wanger shot Jennings Lang!" . . . Hal Wallis is enthused about Dean Martin's new voice. "It's deeper and sounds more virile than before," Hal told me. And Dean, on the set of Jumping Jacks, said, "I dunno

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

This looks like a record year for real life action stories datelined Hollywood. Following close on the Wanger-Bennett-Lang fracas, Humphrey Bogart tossed Oscar Levant out of his home at the height of a party, Steve Cochran bopped an unwelcome guest in his home, Zeppo Marx clouted producer Alex Gottlieb and James Mason slapped Bill Saroyan. No newspaperman has to make up stories about this old town. . . . That was a fortune spent by RKO to advertise Warner star Jane Wyman for the best-actress Oscar for her work in The Blue Veil. Warners', on the other hand, spent another FORTUNE exploiting another gal who isn't even under contract there, and I do mean Vivien Leigh

Dry skin. "Noxzema has helped my skin look so much softer and smoother," says Val Lewis of New Orleans. "It's fine for rough, dry skin."

"Creamwash." "My skin looks smoother since I 'creamwash' with Noxzema," says Phyllis Riggs of Brooklyn. "I recommend it to all my friends."

MORNING:

1. For thorough cleansing, "creamwash": Apply Noxzema liberally to face and neck. Then with a cloth wrung out in warm water "creamwash" with Noxzema instead of using soap. How fresh and clean your skin looks! No dry, drawn feeling!

2. Apply Noxzema lightly as powder base. It helps protect your skin all day long.

EVENING:

3. "Creamwash" again with medicated Noxzema. See how completely it washes away make-up and dirt.

4. Now apply Noxzema as your night cream to help skin look softer and smoother. Pat a bit extra over any blemishes* to help heal them. It's medicated—that's one secret! Greaseless, too. No smeary face! No messy pillow!

Follow these directions for a lovelier-looking skin!

Blemishes*. "Until I started using Noxzema, I always had blemishes*," Norma Buchanan of Montreal says. "Now my skin looks so much fresher."

Make-up base. "I always use Noxzema under my make-up and I'm delighted with the way it helps heal blemishes*," says Paulette Hendrix of Savannah.

See for yourself how quickly the new Noxzema Home Beauty Routine can help your skin look smoother, lovelier.

This simple routine was developed by a noted skin doctor. In actual clinical tests, it helped 4 out of 5 women to have lovelier-looking complexions—often within two weeks.

Surveys show that all over the United States hundreds and hundreds of women like those pictured here are switching to this sensible skin care, shown at the left.

Read how it helped Val Lewis of New Orleans who had rough, dry skin. Read how delighted Phyllis Riggs, Norma Buchanan and Paulette Hendrix are with the way Noxzema helps heal externally-caused blemishes and keep skin looking smooth and lovely. Hundreds report similar results.

See how it can help you. No matter how many other creams you have used, try Noxzema. It is a medicated formula. That's ONE secret of its effectiveness!

If you have problem skin and have been longing for a complexion that wins compliments—that looks softer, smoother—just give Noxzema's Home Beauty Routine a 10-day trial.

THE AFRICAN QUEEN

picture of the month

■ The African Queen is pure delight—an unusual, thrilling blend of high adventure and romantic love in the Congo which communicates enchantingly some of the plain, wonderful joy of living. For the woman of the movie, Katharine Hepburn is a creature who has virtually given up living—she is a narrow, prissy, cold, "psalm-singing, skinny old maid," spending her years as a missionary among the heathen tribes of Africa. And the man of the movie, Humphrey Bogart, is quite the other extreme—a coarse, slangy, easygoing, gin-swilling, warm and human skipper with an unmistakable passion for life. And The African Queen traces the impact of these two upon each other in a time of great danger: the year is 1914 and both are British subjects in a remote jungle territory that has just been seized by the Germans. How this man and woman flee all alone on his shaky, small boat down an almost unnavigable river, finding love, insects, wild animals, heat, leeches, malaria, Germans and other menaces along the way, is the rich, exciting substance of The African Queen. Filmed in Africa in color under John Huston's masterful direction The African Queen has all the spell-binding wonder of faraway places. And Bogart, as the man who loves life, and Hepburn, as the woman who learns from him to love life, bring out the subtleties of their relationship sometimes humorously, sometimes touchingly, always magnificently. They and their movie make you want to toss a hat or two in the air.

THIS WOMAN IS DANGEROUS

Crime has rarely been so glamorous as it is in This Woman Is Dangerous. Leading a life of larceny, Joan Crawford suffers for it by having both Dennis Morgan and David Brian madly in love with her, by wearing gowns that would tax the purse of a Rockefeller, and by carrying around—for pocket money—small sums like 30 or 40 thousand dollars. Having just pulled off a $90,000 robbery with partner-in-crime Brian, Joan takes herself to a hospital for a major operation on her very lovely eyes. Seems Joan is going blind in This Woman Is Dangerous, but doctor Dennis Morgan performs a successful operation, saves Joan's sight and decides while he's at it that Joan would be so nice to come home to after a hard day over an operating table. Will Joan marry doctor Morgan? Can she tell him about her sordid past? Will partner-in-crime Brian tolerate her leaving him? Despite the Hollywood edict that crime must not pay, things work out miraculously well for Joan, and we're really very glad—Joan deserves the best. But may we hope that all impressionable little girls who see This Woman Is Dangerous won't rush into a life of crime on the chance that they, like Joan, will suffer only by having both Dennis Morgan and David Brian fall madly in love with them? Cast: Joan Crawford, Dennis Morgan, David Brian.—Warners.

PHONE CALL FROM A STRANGER

Reminiscent in mood and structure of A Letter To Three Wives, this one might be called A Phone Call To Two Wives And One Husband. For Phone Call From A Stranger also looks in episodic style at several marriages and the effect upon each of a remarkable event—this time a phone call from a man informing two wives and one husband that their mates have been killed in a plane crash. Like Letter To Three Wives, Phone Call From A Stranger mixes wisecracks, laughter, tears and pathos shrewdly and effectively as it tells the story of each marriage up to the plane crash and after. It'll be tough, too, to decide which couple you find most interesting —Shelley Winters as a stripteaser who is fighting a losing battle for Craig Stevens against his nasty mother, Evelyn Varden; Michael Rennie as a doctor whose wife, Beatrice Straight, has been helping him hide a terrible secret; or Bette Davis as the wife who once ran away from her loud, boorish husband, Keenan Wynn, but found him still willing to help her and love her when she got in a bad jam. Gary Merrill is the man who has to make the phone calls, and each of the stories he runs across in these marriages manages to be vastly entertaining and not at all morbid, though death enters all of them. For this, expert writer Nunnally Johnson

LONE STAR

Clark Gable's still The King. In Lone Star, a Western recalling the turbulent days before Texas joined the Union, Gable looks trimmer, rides faster, fights harder, shoots straighter and makes love smoother than most of the boys who have come along in those 20 years since he took the throne in Hollywood. Lone Star is solid, fast action fare, with Gable punching away against Broderick Crawford for the heart of Ava Gardner as well as the destiny of Texas. Crawford, a selfish, power-seeking politico, has everything to gain by keeping Texas an independent nation but Gable, an agent of Andrew Jackson, maneuvers successfully to bring her into the Union. The political wrangling never grows too burdensome in Lone Star; there are always Comanche Indians or Crawford and his stooges to whoop it up in fisticuffs with Gable. And though Ava is at first ardently on Crawford's side in love and politics, time and Gable change all that, bringing about two unions —Texas with the U.S.A., and Gardner with Gable. It is worth noting that Ava looks dazzling and is a credit to Texas whatever side she is on.

Cast: Clark Gable, Ava Gardner, Broderick Crawford, Lionel Barrymore.—MGM.

sets out for Northern California in 1900, an arrogant, lawless, land-grabbing lumberman with his greedy eye on the forests of redwood trees there. Kirk means to push the poor settlers off the land and make his million in a flash. "Honey, we're going to be rich, rich," he boasts to blonde Patrice Wymore, his dance hall sweetie. But after a gander at brunette Eve Miller, the sweet, devout daughter of a settler, Kirk chucks Patrice and switches to the settlers' side against another mob that is trying to grab the land. Kirk is always the blazing man of action—he fights bad guy John Archer at the edge of a cliff, blows up the dam Archer is using to hamstring the settlers, and rescues Eve from a runaway train just before it plunges off a bridge. Heel or hero, Kirk is rugged as a stick of dynamite all the way through The Big Trees. But we can't help wondering: whatever became of the Douglas who portrayed a quiet, intelligent schoolteacher so gently and appealingly in A Letter To Three Wives?
Cast: Kirk Douglas, Eve Miller, Patrice Wymore.—Warners.

INVITATION

The beautiful lady with the rare, fatal disease—the doctors give her only one year to live—is back with us again in Invitation. Bette Davis played her in Dark Victory, Margaret Sullavan had her fling in No Sad Songs For Me, and now it's Dorothy McGuire who is hovering tremulously and tearfully on the brink of rigor mortis. We bow to Miss McGuire: in a script that is soggy and artificial as a soap opera, she acts beautifully, with passionate belief in the tragedy of the rich, sick and lonely girl in Invitation. Though dying, Miss McGuire brings the only note of life into the movie. For if a fatal malady were not at work here, Invitation might simply —and easily—talk itself to death. First Dorothy talks of her marriage to Van Johnson: she thought he loved her but discovers he was practically bought by her father to make her last year happy. Then Van unfolds his side of the marriage: he may have been "bought" at first, but he has come now to love Dorothy deeply. It makes for a powerful lot of talk and we're afraid Van is not at his happiest in this morose conversation piece. And just when Dorothy has decided she doesn't mind dying, having had Van's love for one whole year, a doctor turns up with a new kind of operation to cure her incurable illness. Miss McGuire therefore has the pleasure of being gloriously tragic all over the place, yet living happily ever after, too—and with Van Johnson. It proves, we guess, that life—and death —can be beautiful.
Cast: Van Johnson, Dorothy McGuire, Ruth Roman, Louis Calhern.—MGM.

SCANDAL SHEET

Pardon us if we let out a long, slow "ho-hum" over Scandal Sheet. But we've had our fill of movies about newspaper life in which the hero is one of those smart, brassy reporters who always beats the police to the scene of the crime, solves murders before the law even has a clue, and seldom does anything so shockingly ordinary as sitting down at a typewriter. John Derek, the wonder boy of Scandal Sheet, reminds us of no reporter we have ever met anywhere in America, and that goes double for his editor, Broderick Crawford, a barking, semi-gangster type who sounds as if he might be taking bets in a

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

■ Two telegrams, delivered to Peter Lawford within a period of ten days by trans-oceanic cable, completely changed the course of the young actor's life.

The first told Pete that his close friend, Lieutenant Charles Dunne, had been killed in action in Korea.

The second brought news of the tragic death of Robert Walker.

For a man to lose his two best friends in the space of a few days is more than tough luck. It is a violent blow that is quite likely to set off an explosion somewhere in his inner being. On the surface, Peter took the news as many men would. He left his hotel room, walked to the nearest bar, and tried to steady his nerves with a stiff drink. He didn't talk about his grief. He still doesn't, but in the months that have passed, it is evident to his most intimate friends that Pete is not the same man he was, and never will be again. At 28, he has run smack into the grim realism he never before encountered during a more or less carefree existence in Hollywood, the least realistic city in the world.

Peter doesn't believe that there's any drama in his life at the moment. He says, "I know that actors are for writing and talking about, but outside of certain personal ambitions of my own in the field of my profession, I can't dig up anything startling about myself."

But, actually, Peter Lawford is at the critical point in his life. And like a gambler, staking all on a throw of the dice, he gives no indication of an awareness of this fact. (Continued on page 96)

sterling in the mood of culture

The matchless beauty of the Wallace Stradivari pattern was inspired by the perfect violins of Antonius Stradivari, whose craftsmanship has never been equalled. Here is a lovely, lilting pattern—exquisite in form, crowned by a sparkling leaf curled back upon itself and enhanced with delightful highlights and shadows. It was created by famed designer William S. Warren in sculptured "Third Dimension Beauty"—the exclusive Wallace artistry in silvercrafting. Stradivari, like every Wallace "Third Dimension Beauty" pattern, is a masterpiece—beautifully formed not only in front, but in profile and back—giving you sterling perfection from every possible view.

Six piece place setting, Stradivari, $32.50
Settings of other patterns from $32.50 to $43.50—all prices include Federal Tax.

Read the exciting design stories of each Wallace pattern in the 32 page book "Treasures in Sterling." It also contains many helpful table-setting ideas. Write (send 10¢ to cover postage) to Wallace Silversmiths, Department 93, Wallingford, Connecticut.

On this and the following 14 pages are stories of Hollywood's lovers—the ones who get their hearts broken, and the ones who get away; the bachelors, the bobby-soxers, the gay divorcées. For each, love holds a different meaning, but always a promise . . .

HOLLYWOOD'S PROBLEM LOVERS

by Louella Parsons

■ Before we go any further—don't for a minute think that I'm against Hollywood's "problem lovers."

If it weren't for the romantic headaches of the widely conspicuous group of Hollywood honeys who can't manage their love lives, Hollywood would be a far less "human" place and probably I wouldn't be pecking out this piece, or have 30 years of a newspaper gossip column behind me—and 20 years of a radio show.

May I tell you something about you? You fans respect the stars who marry and stay married and who enjoy happy home lives.

But you eat up stories about those less fortunate glamor girls and boys who can't seem to cope with Cupid.

To even an amateur psychiatrist like myself—this seems to prove that more people have love problems than don't have 'em—so what I have to say from here on is in a purely sympathetic light—and should be so considered.

Getting down to cases, I don't know any girl in any walk of life anywhere who wants more to be in love, be married and have a happy home life than Betty Hutton. And yet love-happiness continually eludes her. Why? Because she's in love with love!

She is constantly mistaking the mirage for the real thing. Knowing her as I do, I believe she has never rid herself of an image of love as it is lived in the movies or in books of fiction.

In her childhood, she never knew a settled, happy, home life. Her father ran out on her mother while Betty and her sister, Marion, were still in pigtails. She never had an example of real love and happiness between her parents in those all important formative years of her youth.

So, Betty turned to a love ideal as it is romantically and attractively lived in musical comedies, movies and fiction thrillers where everything is constantly exciting and where affairs d'amour are lived at a colorful pace.

Everytime she falls in love, I believe Betty sees herself as a fiction heroine. When she was married to Ted Briskin her "role" was that of the wife and mother carrying a financial load and forced (by Ted) to behave in a sedate and mature manner that stifled her natural exuberant instincts.

When her marriage failed, as it was bound to do, Betty's next big romance was with Robert Sterling. Everything she had been holding back as Mrs. Ted Briskin, she let go when good-looking Bob came into her life. She danced, she sang, she "necked" openly and unabashedly with Bob as the "heroine," suddenly released from too much responsibility. (Continued on next page)

HOLLYWOOD'S PROBLEM LOVERS by louella parsons

Hailed as Hedy Lamarr's successor to "most beautiful woman in the world" title, will Liz find beauty a hindrance in love?

HERE ARE HOLLYWOOD'S UNHAPPY PEOPLE; THEY CAN'T STAY IN LOVE—OR OUT OF TROUBLE!

(Continued from preceding page) Betty's next romantic mood was a five-day "engagement" to brilliant, young producer, Norman Krasna. During this interlude, Betty dramatized herself as the little girl with "no education" who came from the wrong side of the tracks, who had no "upbringing" but who, miraculously, had attracted the love of a near genius.

All during their hectic and short-lived romance, Betty's constant comment was "How can he be in love with little old me?" When the excitement over the Zing Girl and the Boy Genius died down—she must have found out. It was hard to believe, but they actually didn't have anything in common!

Right now, Betty's love life is choreographer Charles O'Curran, a talented dance director, and the "role" is obvious: the successful star helping a clever young man up the ladder of fame. I think Betty will remain in love with O'Curran just as long as this Lady Bountiful mood interests her.

Someday, sometime, a real love will come into Betty's life—for she is a generous, goodhearted girl with a sincere desire for a home and family life. When that happens—she'll be glad to stop all the pretending and settle down to being a woman in love—and not a fictional character.

Elizabeth Taylor's love problem is obvious—too much spoiled youth plastered over by a heavy coating of pseudo-sophistication.

Before we criticize luscious Liz too much, we should stop and remember she's a kid just out of bobbysox who is having a you-know-what of a time kicking up her French heels along the romance trail.

Whether or not she is married to Michael Wilding, Liz and love are not through with each other. And they won't be until she is far, far more mature—not just a little girl playing at a grown up emotion.

She was just a child "dressed up" in a wedding gown when she married Nicky Hilton. It was a child "playing" grown-up who had previously announced herself as being in love with football star Glenn Davis, and later with millionaire Bill Pawley. But Elizabeth won't fool me—with all her sophistication and cigarette smoking and gay girl-of-the-world behavior—until she proves that she is really a mature human being by acting like one.

Women who are outstandingly beautiful to look upon—as Elizabeth—frequently have trouble with love problems all their lives. Consider the case of Hedy Lamarr who has been hailed as the most beautiful woman in the world and who, as such, should (Continued on page 91)

Faced with the most difficult decision of his life, Gary Cooper is torn between his love for Pat Neal, and his reluctance to break up his home. Coop says: "I love Pat and she loves me, but it isn't as easy as that."

Love problems were blamed by friends for Coop's recent illness. He recuperated in Sun Valley with daughter Maria, wife Rocky. Eighteen years of married life have a great hold on Gary.

Betty Hutton, desperately wanting a secure home life for herself and her daughters, now thinks she's in love with Charles O'Curran. But Betty has always mistaken the mirage for the real thing, and happiness keeps eluding her.

With a stormy, front-page courtship behind them, Ava and Frankie's troubles are just beginning. Most Hollywood observers feel that their pre-marital battles were a prelude to what's next.

Lana can't find a man who wants her for herself and not for her glamorous reputation. She has always been willing to give up her career for marriage, but may lose out again with Fernando Lamas who already has a wife.

Money was one of the causes for Sylvia and Clark Gable's split-up. Clark resented her careless spending, and may have compared her to his third wife, Carole Lombard, who went 50-50 on everything.

Holding hands with Liz Taylor helped dispel one of the false impressions so common about Monty. The guy really does like to step out!

His reputation as a recluse

■ There are a couple of tales told in Hollywood that are supposed to point up the oddness of Montgomery Clift, with respect, of course, to his poverty-stricken appearance and his shy immersion in solitude.

One day, a story goes, a grip working on a Clift picture had missed his lunch and during the afternoon had slipped out to buy a sandwich and a cup of coffee. He brought them back to the set, perched on top of a property wagon and began to wolf the food. Then he happened to spot Monty Clift, slumped disconsolately in a canvas chair staring into space. The grip put the sandwich down and had trouble swallowing the bite he had in his mouth.

"What's the matter?" asked a fellow grip, "aren't you hungry any

WHO IS MONTY KIDDING?

Contrary to public opinion, good food served well is very important to Monty. When he dated Judy Balaban, he took her to midnight supper at a swanky New York night spot on the East Side where he was completely at home.

more? Why aren't you eating now?"

"Sure I'm hungry," he said, "but how do you think I can eat with that poor son of a gun over there starving to death?"

Then there was the time when a group at Paramount was collecting clothing for a European relief organization. A couple of employees were wheeling a hand truck down the main studio street, gleefully chattering about the haul they'd made at some dressing rooms. Montgomery Clift turned into the street on his way to makeup. He was dressed in ill-mated trousers and jacket and wore a rough shirt without a tie. Nothing seemed to fit—and the outfit was obviously beyond the stage of salvage. The collectors fell silent until Clift had passed and was out of earshot. Then one of the men halted the truck, patted the bulging bundles and turned to his companion.

"Say," he said, "are you sure we're sending this stuff to the right place?"

There are other stories, too many to record here, and they all have pretty much the same point. Poor Montgomery Clift. Some of the yarns say that he is robbed every pay day and never gets to keep a dime. Others that he is so gone on his work that he forgets to eat and buy clothes; or that he hates simple luxuries like steaks and warm coats. Much of this is believed—and much of it is tagged publicity. However, it is generally conceded that Montgomery Clift is a character with a penchant (Continued on page 83)

Monty likes money, he frankly admits. "It gives a guy wings," he says, and also finances his many traveling jaunts. Here's Monty in Italy.

LADY

Cesar Romero, perennial bachelor-girl escort, often dates Janie—as well as Joan Crawford, Ann Sheridan.

Jane's often been rumored engaged to man-about-town Greg Bautzer, never has she even hinted it was true.

Lew Ayres (above) dated Jane after her divorce. Gossips cried love, said same about Manny Sacks (below).

Jane Wyman's getting ready for the fling of her life—and you can bet your bottom dollar that when the smoke clears away she'll be clinging to the arm of a brand new flame.

BY STEVE CRONIN

Jane Wyman strutted into a shop in Beverly Hills recently and picked a small bronze statue from the window display. She held it at different angles and a salesgirl approached her.

"What do you get for this work of art, honey?" Jane asked.

"Twenty dollars, madam," said the girl.

The manager appeared from behind a curtain leading to the back room, saw who his customer was and began to fidget with a table display.

"Stick it in a nice box and send it over to my house, will you, kid," said Jane. And after giving the address she said, "C.O.D."

"Yes, madam," the salesgirl said as she started towards the counter.

"Thanks, honey," said Jane and charged back out into the street.

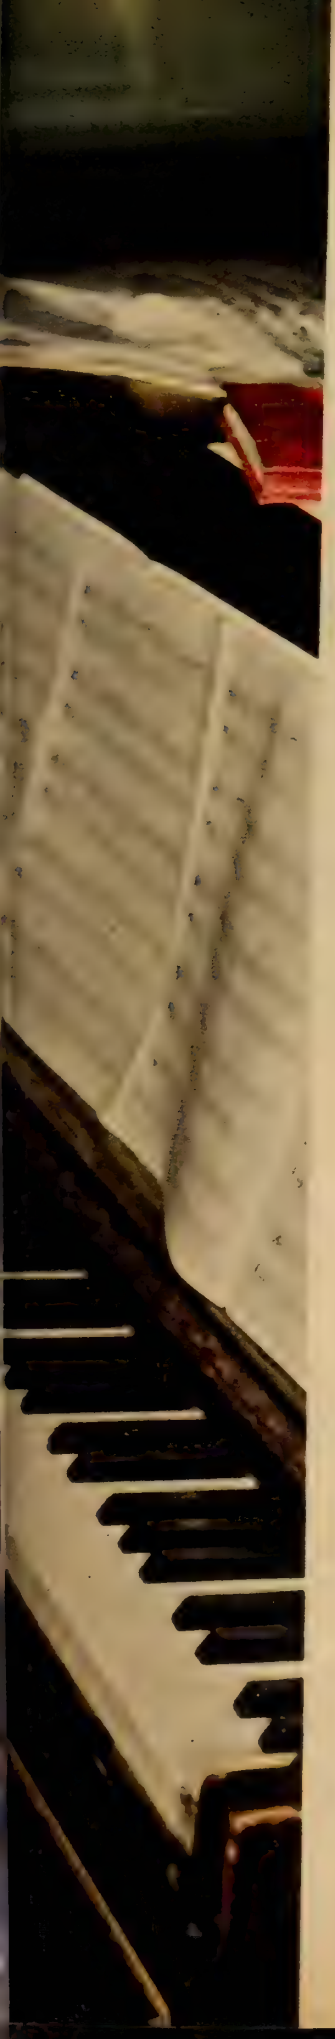
"Hey, wait a minute," cried the salesgirl, dropping out of character. "Just a minute, lady!"

The manager came over. "What's the matter?" he said.

"She was in and out so fast," said the salesgirl, "that I forgot to ask her her name."

"The lady," said the manager testily, "was Jane Wyman."

"It was not!" said the salesgirl.



"It certainly was," said the manager. "I've waited on her before. I know her."

"Well, it just happens," said the salesgirl, "that Jane Wyman is my favorite movie star. I never miss one of her pictures. And if I saw her in the middle of the night with the lights out and my glasses off I'd know her. That was not Jane Wyman."

The manager won, but not without a battle. And the salesgirl wasn't alone. It is a very usual thing for people not to recognize Jane Wyman—about as common as the stories that are told about fans not recognizing their favorite movie stars. But with Jane Wyman it's different. The real, physical, emotional Jane Wyman is so far removed from the screen Jane Wyman that it's not at all odd that she is seldom recognized.

If you have seen her in The Glass Menagerie, The Blue Veil or Johnny Belinda, you wouldn't know her if you saw her. In all of those pictures she played a mouse, an unvital character with a limp, a twitch, an affliction (Continued on page 88)

His marriage was a tragic failure; it threw him for a loss. But now he's Happy Dan the bachelor man with a new girl every Sunday. And so he says:

Busy playing the field, Dan has his choice of dates: June Haver (above), Ann Miller, Jane Nigh, Barbara Whiting all love his company.

"I'LL NEVER MARRY AGAIN"

by sheilah graham

■ "I'll never marry again, Sheilah, so help me." It's Dan Dailey speaking, and I usually take such a statement with several grains of skepticism. But something final in the way Dan says it convinces me absolutely. I'll go on record and state he will not ever marry again. (Not for years and years, anyway!)

I gathered this information at the Encore Restaurant on La Cienega Boulevard, owned and run by Dan's great pal, Andy McIntyre, as newly divorced from Marilyn Maxwell as Dan is from his Liz. At the Encore we talked of love, life and Dan Dailey.

Over the hot consommé and salad, I ask Dan, "Is it true what I hear about you and girls?" Dan grins and says, "What do you hear—that I love em?" "That you rotate them," says I. He roars. "I hadn't thought of it like that. But you're right. I don't want to get too close to any girl. Why should I ever fall in love? I'm happier as a bachelor than I ever was when I was married to Liz."

I was coming to the ex-Mrs. Dailey later. First I wanted to know about Dan's dates with Jane Nigh, Shelley Winters, June Haver, Ann Miller and young Barbara Whiting, among many others. I wanted to know whether any one of these girls meant something romantically to Dan, or were they all just a part of an objective system for playing a tune without having to pay the piper. And I do mean marriage. He told me—with the frankness and lack of self-kidding I have always liked him for:

"First of all, you must know this about me," Dan said. "I'm a male. I like to support my woman, I like to pay for everything she needs. And I can. If I weren't in show business I could work as a laborer. I'm strong, I've dug ditches. I could never come home to a wife who was helping to pay for the groceries. That is why I could never marry a career woman. That rules out Shelley Winters right away. And Jane Nigh and June Haver and (Continued on page 97)

STILL IN LOVE WITH ALY?

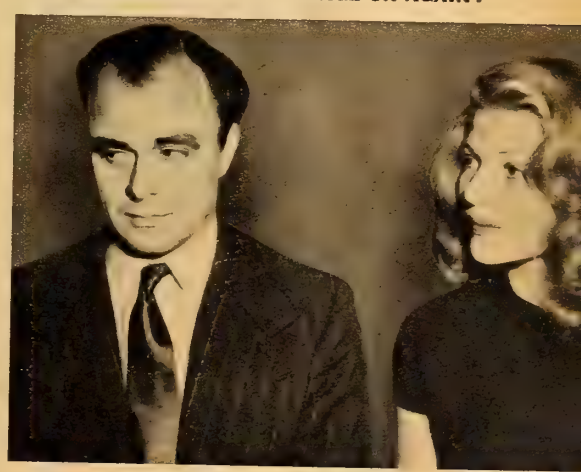
The divorce waits in Reno, but Rita sits tight in Hollywood. Is it because Aly Khan is not only on her mind but in her heart as well? BY CYNTHIA MILLER

■ Remember last year how determined Rita Hayworth was to divorce Aly Khan? Remember how dramatically she left her playboy husband in Africa, flew to Europe, bundled up her babies, and proceeded to Reno? Remember all the hullabaloo and headlines out of Nevada? RITA DEMANDS $3,000,000 FOR CHILD . . . ALY'S LAWYER TO FLY FROM PARIS . . . RITA WARNS ALY TO QUIT STALLING.

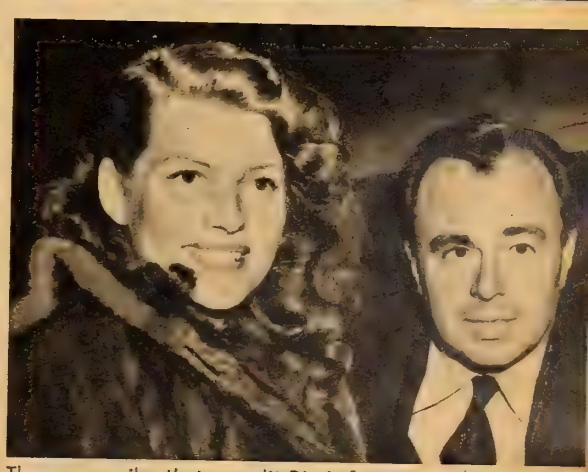
That was last May.

At this writing, Rita Hayworth is still Mrs. Aly Khan, and still Princess Rita to the Moslems.

What cooks? How come after establishing legal residence in Nevada, hiring attorneys, filing documents, obeying all the divorce requirements to the letter, Rita has failed to pick up her divorce?



She may pick it up any day after she finishes Affair In Trinidad with Glenn Ford. She may even have the valuable document as you read this article —but why all the delay? And why did Rita say, "I'm holding the divorce in abeyance."?



You can't get Rita to talk about the Prince these days, or for that matter, about any of the men in her life. Could it be that despite all the anguish and trouble he caused her, Rita is still in love with Aly?

On New Year's Day this year, Aly phoned Rita from Rio de Janeiro. The call lasted 30 minutes and cost $120.

When Rita slipped the phone onto its cradle, her eyes were misty. She decided at that moment to let the divorce lie. After all, there was really no hurry. Whenever she wanted she could fly up to Reno and get the decree papers in a few hours. (Continued on page 102)

IS THEIR ON-AND-OFF MARRIAGE ON AGAIN?

The sunny smiles that once lit Rita's face gave way to cool disdain when Aly started misbehaving. But, friends hint, he'll get the chance to make her smile again.

LITTLE MISS LONELY HEART

Ann Blyth lives passionately—on the screen. Does she expect fiery roles to make up for a life without love?

■ Ann Blyth is driving a magnificent new Cadillac these days. Nine years ago, when she was 14 and just signed by Universal-International, she stated her two fondest ambitions. One was to have a mink coat. The other was to own a Cadillac. She didn't mention a private swimming pool.

She bought the mink coat two years ago. The Cadillac and the swimming pool—they were given to her by Howard Hughes a little before 1952.

Now if any other young star had received two such lavish gifts, gossips would be yapping all over the world and every eyebrow in Hollywood would be higher than the hairline.

But it's Ann Blyth, so everyone says, "Oh, yes, the Cad and the swimming pool are bonuses she got for going into The Korean Story. That's all, because everyone knows that, romantically, Ann is idealistic as a schoolgirl, and she'd rather have a lonely heart than a bad conscience. And it's true, despite the fact that the very charming bachelor Mr. Hughes has always liked lovely, talented ladies around him. (And the lovely, talented ladies have returned the compliment.) But Ann Blyth, as lovely as any of them, and twice as talented as most, fits into a separate category.

Last winter, after a few weeks shooting of The Korean Story, the star, Claudette Colbert, became too ill to continue. Delays were costly and Hughes looked for a replacement. He decided that Ann was the ideal girl to replace Miss Colbert.

She was immediately contacted, but for the first time in her Hollywood career, she hesitated. A change had come over Ann Blyth. Very quietly, but very confidently she was beginning to assert herself.

She hesitated. Other actresses would have argued, screamed, stalked about like tigresses, but Ann displayed a quiet resistance that could move mountains.

She hardly said a word; she knew better. She knew she'd just have to smile and look up from the depths of her exquisite eyes. So by gesture, rather than talk, Ann conveyed the idea that after all a role written (Continued on page 68)

These were John Wayne's words when his marriage

■ This is a difficult story to write. It is difficult because the author is not sure how to write it. Should it be the story of an actor in trouble with his wife—an actor who has been chosen the greatest star in Hollywood and the happiest in his private life. Or should it be the tale of a man who has a problem and wants to work it out? Probably, because the author was, in a minor way, there at the time, it should just be a recitation of events that will tell everything. Yes, that's the way to tell it.

The reason for the story is a series of news items that was tottering. Will they be enough to save it? MODERN SCREEN brings you the story of a troubled man.

appeared in the nation's press. They stated simply that John Wayne and his wife of seven years had separated, and that she had retained an attorney to handle a settlement of their joint properties. It said nothing of divorce, but it hinted that such a thing was possible. These news stories came as no surprise to this writer because he knew about it but had decided not to tell —not, at least, until it had to be told. Now it does.

I decided not to tell this story just after I heard it, in an airplane last Christmas Eve. The plane had been in the air for hours. I sat next to John Wayne, and in the comfortable peace of the giant ship, with the propellers humming a hypnotic spell around us, we talked for several hours. We talked about a hundred things as men will when they have time on their hands—and just for a moment we talked about him and his wife. But everything was said in that minute. Then the pretty little Latin hostess came along. She was carrying a silver tray on which there were two pink cocktails in long-stem misty glasses. Where they came from, at 18,000 feet in the (Continued on page 103)

how Betty Grable lives

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

A little imagination, a lot of red paint—and the James' gloomy, 25-year-old mansion became a home just as vivid and up-to-the-minute as Betty herself!

The solid, well-built balustrade in the front hall, made by an English craftsman years ago, could not be duplicated today.

Books and racing trophies line the walls of the library. The compact bar in the corner at right was once a useless closet.

A long-neglected, over-grown Italian garden in back of the house was replaced by this modern pool and brick terrace. Wooden benches, which made the grounds resemble a park, were removed.

Over-sized couches and an eight-foot square coffee table fill up the huge living room. Either a portrait of the James' girls or one of the new colts will go over the fireplace—but Betty hasn't decided which it will be yet!

The dark mahogany panelling of the library was brightened by vivid colors and gay fabrics. The two lamps were made from brass hitching posts.

The unique dining room arrangement was Betty's idea. Whenever she entertains, and she likes to do so often, she pushes together the three tables (only two are shown above) to make one unit.

by Marva Peterson

■ Betty Grable has one favorite household chore. She loves to pay bills! On the first Saturday of each month, she clutches a stack of statements, grabs her typewriter, sneaks into husband Harry's study, and for two whole dreamy hours does nothing but type out checks. This done, she pats them into a little pile and leaves them for the head-of-the-house to sign.

One Saturday a few months ago, Betty was ecstatically happy. She had not only made up with her studio after a nine-month suspension but here she was, living in a new house and typing out checks in Harry's new study.

She had just finished paying the gasoline bill when her two auburn-haired little daughters, Jessica and Victoria, suddenly burst into the room. (Continued on next page)

Their eyes were burning with excitement.

"Mummie," cried Victoria. "Guess what!"

"Sh-h-h," Mummie cautioned. "Your daddy's still asleep."

Six-year-old Jessica shook her head sadly. "Maybe you'll have to wake him, Mummie. Something's happened."

Betty frowned and turned towards Vickie. "What is it, darling? What's happened?"

Vicki grinned. "Some people are having a picnic on our lawn."

"You're not fibbing now, are you?"

"Honest, Mummie. A whole bunch are down there. They parked their car under our trees."

"And," added Jessica, "they're eating and eating and eating. Why don't I wake Daddy? Maybe he can chase them with his trumpet."

Betty got up. "Don't dare disturb your father. I'll come and see about it."

She tip-toed through the bedroom and hurried down the steps with Vicki and Jessie close behind.

As soon as she opened the front door, Betty Grable chuckled. Sure enough, a family of five were sitting on her front lawn munching sandwiches and pouring milk out of a thermos.

Betty, dressed in her usual outfit—slacks and turtle neck sweater—walked over to the trespassers.

"I'm sorry to disturb you," she announced, "but you're on private property."

The embarrassed father jumped to his feet. "Gosh!" he explained. "We sure are sorry. We're from out of town, and we've been riding around searching for a picnic spot. When we saw those big open gates, we thought this was some sort of public park. Sure am sorry, Miss. We'll clear out in a minute." He stopped and looked down at Vickie (Continued on page 105)

The roomy kitchen was completely remodeled, is now as modern as anyone could wish. The gay, red table, with its permanent-finish top, is just the right size for those informal, between-meal snacks.

Victoria and Jessica helped their mother select the blue and white plaid wallpaper, and the white furniture, for their bedroom. Practical Betty bought four washable bedspreads, uses two of them as canopys.

▲ Harry objected to Betty's suggestion of red for their bedroom, so she decided on raspberry. When Harry first saw the bed pillows, he thought they looked like lollipops—but Betty's happy with them.

▼ A part of the attic was made over into a combined study and dressing room for Harry, with plenty of room for all his mementos and clothes. Betty's mother crocheted the afghan on the couch for him.

GIRLS SIGH OVER RIC, THEIR "BEAUTIFUL GUMDROP"—BUT HE JUST BLUSHES AND REMAINS THE PERFECT

Ricardo and Georgie (of the glamorous Young sisters' clan) flew into marriage after a two-week courtship. She got him a long time before Hollywood did, and after seven years of marital bliss, it looks as if he'll be hers for keeps.

There'll soon be a new addition to this portrait. Four-year-old Mark, Anita, six, and Laura, two, will have a new playmate named Phillip (if it's a boy). Rick's life centers around his family. He deserts them only for work.

■ The Hurricane Bar on Broadway was not exactly the place you'd pick for a grand premiere. It was bedlam that night with a phony tropical storm beating against a pane of glass and flashes of phony lightning blazing on the customers who sat there in the murky room mainly because they had no better place to go.

But at one of the tables was an eager young guy of about 20 with blue-black hair and an olive complexion. His eyes were glued to a juke box which played jerky little movie shorts when you slipped in a dime. "Soundies," they called them. After this excited character had invested six dimes, Number Seven came up. It was his big moment. "The Latin From Staten Island," the title flickered, "starring Ricardo Montalban."

"Here I come," he breathed expectantly.

And there he was—on a cardboard ferry flashing his white teeth and bawling out Gus Van's title tune. In a minute he was off and Number Eight was on. His starring debut was over. It was big stuff for Ricardo; he'd actually earned 70 dollars for that triumphant performance, which marked a big step forward in his career. Before that he'd been an extra in "soundies" for ten bucks a picture.

A sailor, who'd been soaking himself in rye, leaned over from the next table and slapped his shoulder.

"Say," he muttered, "was zat you?"

"Yes, yes indeed," responded Ricardo gratefully.

"Buddy," said the sailor, "you really stink!"

By now Ricardo Montalban would be the last person in the world to challenge that early verdict, although at the time it didn't make him feel very happy. But by now, of course, things are a little different. The pride of the soundies is now the pride of MGM, and his efforts are definitely more appreciated.

A few years ago, Ricardo walked into the premiere of Fiesta unmolested, but on the way out he lost part of his clothes and got lipstick smeared all over what was left. After On An Island With You and that hot dance with Syd Charisse, he got passionate pen proposals like the one which said, "I just want to die dancing—held tight in your arms!" And as recently as Across The Wide Missouri, when he bared his beautiful muscles, a veteran MGM mail clerk disgustedly handed him a scented letter begging, "Lift me up on your wild horse, my darling, and let us ride away together into the sunset!"

"Listen, Rick," said the clerk, "you'd better watch it. Dames haven't gone screwy like this since Rudy Valentino made The Sheik—and you know what happened to him."

Ricardo Montalban is the first truly Americanized Latin to take Hollywood by storm. And to tell the truth, although he's been around Hollywood seven years now, not more than a dozen people understand him. From Valentino himself clear down to Fernando Lamas, Hollywood's exotic menaces have been cats of a different stripe—and to some selfish ladies it's a shame that Ricardo's not.

Not long ago at a big Hollywood gala, Ricardo started dancing at seven o'clock and kept it up until four-thirty in the morning, sitting down only to snatch something to eat at nine. When he finally left with his wife, Georgiana, the lining of his dinner jacket was wringing wet and the stitching in the sleeves was ripped out (he had to throw it away the next day). His hair was tumbled and his face flushed with fun. Watching him exit thus an envious doll, one of the gang who had stood in line for his dances all night, clucked regretfully and shook her carefully coiffured head in obvious dismay.

"Oh, man," she thought out loud, "What that kid would do to Hollywood if he were only single!"

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HAIR IN THE WORLD

Hollywood's most famous beauty experts formed MODERN SCREEN's board of judges and chose these 12 stars as the best-tressed of the year.

■ For the second successive year, nine of Hollywood's top beauty experts were invited by the editors of MODERN SCREEN to select the 12 stars who have the most beautiful hair in the world. The job was both hard (last year's winners were automatically eliminated) and easy (lovely hair is almost a commonplace among Hollywood actresses). But the judges finally decided on these outstanding beauties, who, by combining skillful care with the most flattering coiffure, merited a place among this most select circle.

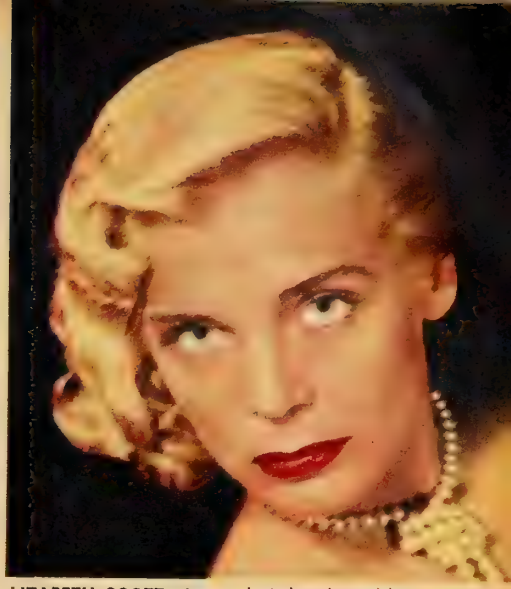
Last year's winners were June Allyson, Ann Blyth, Bette Davis, Rhonda Fleming, Ava Gardner, Deborah Kerr, Virginia Mayo, Maureen O'Hara, Ginger Rogers, Ruth Roman, Elizabeth Taylor, Lana Turner and Jane Wyman.

There is a saying among Hollywood beauty experts that goes, "A face is a face, but a head of hair is a mop you can really do something about." Despite the fact that the stars pictured on these two pages have the kind of faces you write home about, they take that saying to heart. They know that hairstyles can make or break them glamorwise, and they pass up coiffure fads for individual cuts that always charm, never grow old. And long ago they learned a simple rule: beautiful hair is clean, shining hair. There are no secret methods for achieving that. Frequent shampooing and brushing result in never-failing loveliness. So take a tip from those who know—wash your way to glamor!

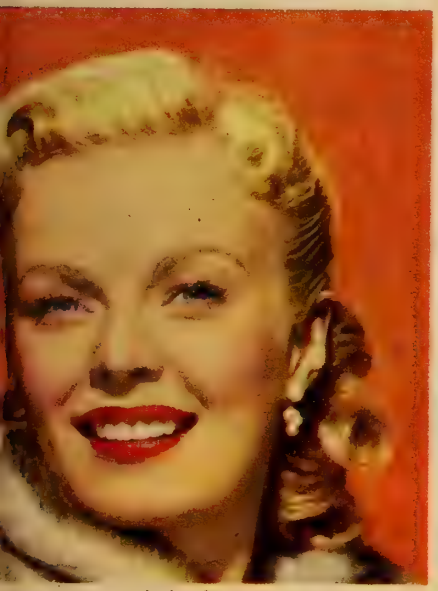
The judges who selected these top 12 stars are: Nellie Manley of Paramount; Jean Burt of Warner Brothers; Larry Germain of RKO-Radio; Irene Brooks of 20th Century-Fox; Joan St. Oegger of Universal-International; Helen Hunt of Columbia; Perc Westmore of Westmore's Salon; Myran Nolt, Beauty Salon, Beverly Wilshire Hotel; Bill Tuttle of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

ESTHER WILLIAMS depends on oil treatments to offset the drying effect of chlorine in swimming pools.

RITA HAYWORTH believes in vigorous root massage, twice a day, preferably outdoors for healthy growth.



DORIS DAY gets a daily shampoo, knows that the secret of beautiful hair is perfect cleanliness.

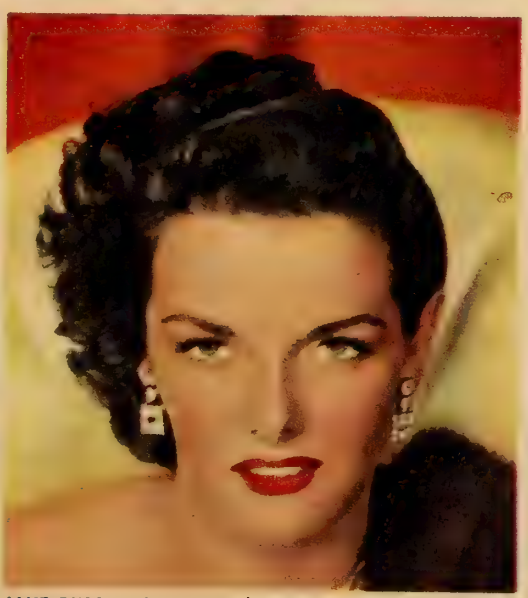


SUSAN HAYWARD's hair requires light permanents, frequent washing to give it body.

JEANNE CRAIN's fashionable short hair-do is easy to manage, stays lovely with brushing, weekly shampoo.

LIZABETH SCOTT is a hair-brush addict. She knows that a simple cut has to gleam.

JUNE HAVER's baby fine tresses call for liberal oil treatments and careful handling.



JOAN CRAWFORD says hair-care is more important than face-care, stresses importance of fine shampoos.

JAN STERLING occasionally wears her hair pulled straight back to ward off split ends.

JANET LEIGH's long bob always shines thanks to 100 strokes a night with a good brush.

JANE RUSSELL ignores style trends, once bobbed her hair, but so many fans protested she let it grow back.

ARLENE DAHL substitutes a champagne rinse for the vinegar wash of grandma's day

The Dereks live the way they like—in the hills far from Hollywood. They can't afford to entertain, avoid glamorous outings.

John didn't have a double for his role in Saturday's Hero. He suffered a concussion during the filming.

■ It had been a hard day for John Derek. It was always hard for him to make a personal appearance in a theater since he couldn't sing, dance, or tell funny stories. He felt that he was making an ass of himself. But that was over now, matinee and evening, and he was ready for a steak.

So, after the Saturday's Hero show, he sat in a restaurant in an Eastern city and while he waited, the local Columbia representative went out to get the papers. He tossed one at John, flipped open to the drama reviews. "He doesn't love you," he grinned wryly. John started to read—and he lost his appetite then and there.

"The sports boys are right," wrote the critic. "After seeing John Derek it's obvious he couldn't play football against 11 powder puffs. A real grid squad would squash this pretty boy in five minutes . . ." And so it went on, taking him cruelly apart.

John tightened his already taut mouth and paled at the temples underneath his tan. "Who the devil is this guy?" he demanded. "Him I've got to get!"

"Sh-h-h!" warned his companion. "Here he comes now."

There was a mumbled introduction and a hand stuck out. Automatically, John took it, then the thought flashed red in his brain, "I hate this man." Suddenly he flipped his hand scornfully up in the air—and swung.

Somebody caught his arm and pushed him back in his seat and it was over. So John started to eat his steak, but without tasting it and he thought moodily about what had happened in this city; how he'd gone to an outlying theater as a favor, when he should have stayed in his hotel with that flu bug, and then, just as he was walking in, the mocking voice, "Well, well,—so this is the re-d-d-d hot quarterback, hey?" And how he'd spun, as if winged by a bullet, and stalked back through the lobby and up to three boy bullies standing there. "I'm not a quarterback," he'd said in a voice flat with anger. "I don't play football. I make pictures. I made a football picture. And does anybody here want to make anything out of that?" But suddenly nobody did and he whirled back inside the theater and was still so mad when he went on stage that he let the audience have it, told them off. said his piece—the longest he'd ever spouted—until they almost had to drag him off the stage.

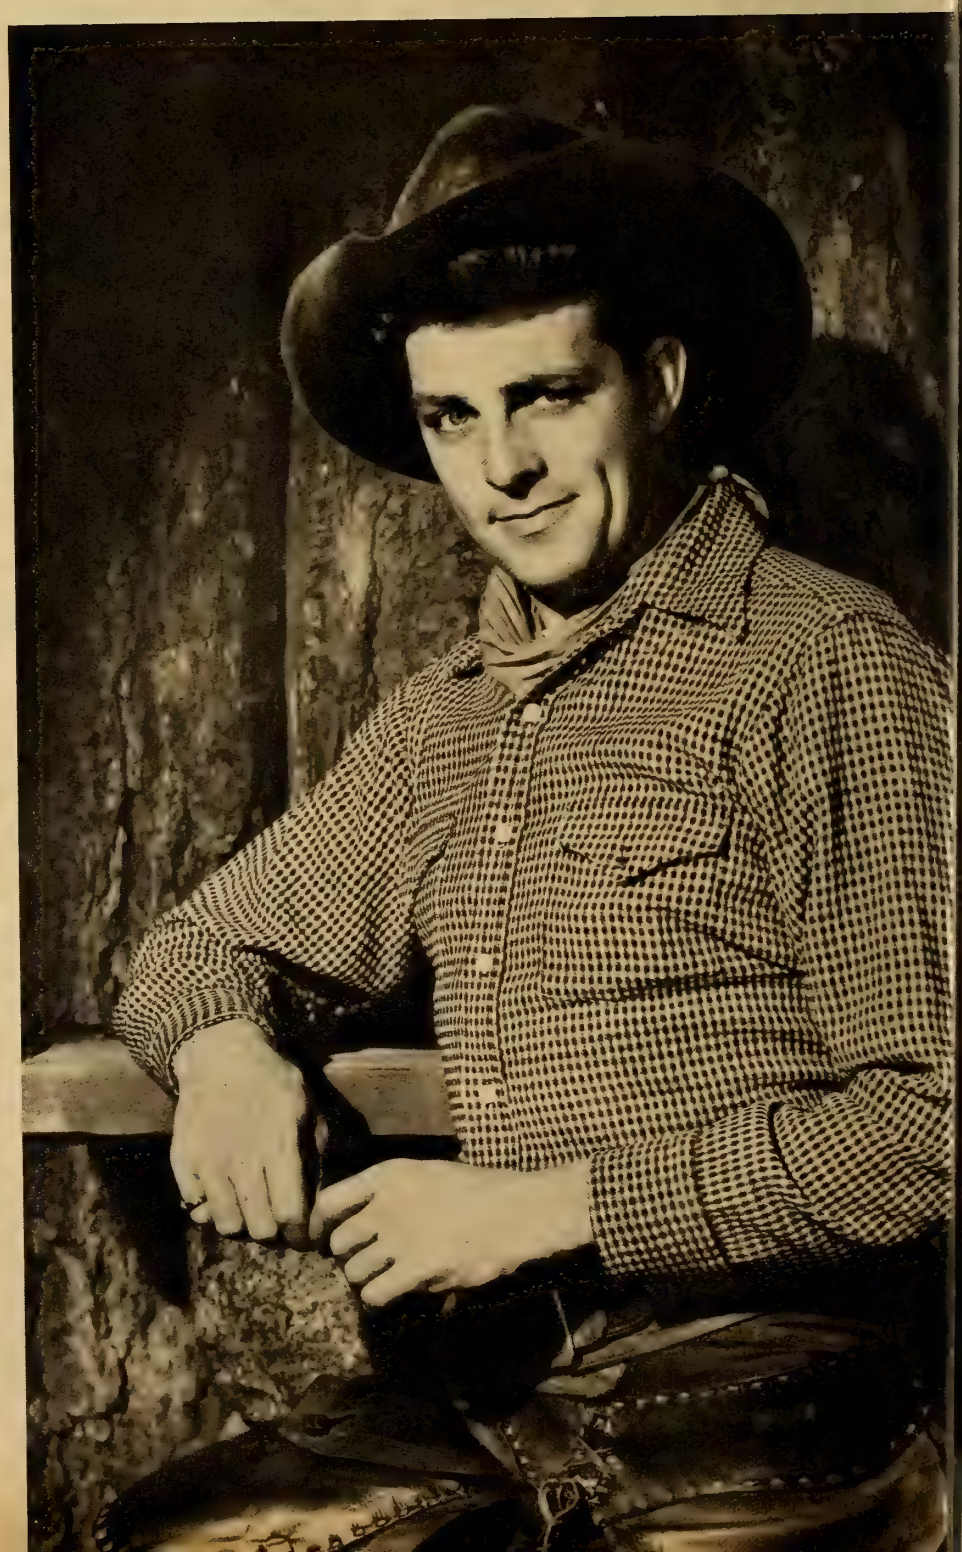
He's going that-a-way!



BY JIM BURTON

"I can't put on any airs," says Dale, who cheerfully donned an apron to help Mom with the dishes on his recent visit to Oklahoma.

His mother's dog "Captain" was waiting to greet Dale and "Chief" on their arrival in Oklahoma. Dale made the trip in 28 hours.

Look out—here comes Dale Robertson! This fellow with an Oklahoma drawl and a hankering for horses is galloping to fame.

Dale, who loves outdoor life, leaped at the chance to shoot quail with his brothers, Roxy and Chet, during his Christmas visit. Came home with his legal limit that very afternoon!

Showing the sights of Oklahoma City to his bride Jackie, gave Dale a big kick. It was the first time she'd met his family, (her whirlwind romance with Dale took place in Hollywood).

Caught in the act! Dale looked up guiltily when his Mom found him tasting her lemon pie. "Dale never could wait till I set it on the table," laughed Mrs. Robertson. "He hasn't changed in any respect."

■ There's an established ritual for success in Hollywood, and whenever an actor breaks into the big-time he usually adheres to it.

He hires a press agent as Bob Hope did. He starts buying his clothes at Brooks Brothers or Eddie Schmidt's as Clark Gable did. He makes a down payment on a yacht as Humphrey Bogart did, and he begins to drive around in a Cadillac or a Lincoln as Dana Andrews did.

Once in a while, however, an actor like Dale Robertson comes along—outspoken, rugged, stubborn, he does exactly as he pleases. And he'll explain to you in his slow, definite drawl, "I don't care if I'm making a million bucks a week. I just don't like putting on airs."

Dale Robertson means what he says. He's only 28 but he knows where he's going and his fans are taking him there faster than he dreamed.

Robertson is so hot at the moment that the studio has hired two extra girls to sort out his fan mail. Exhibitors all over the country are shouting for more Robertson pictures, and studio executives, who've placed him in six films during 1951, are trying to see if they can squeeze him into seven this year.

Despite this sudden popularity and the fact that he is currently earning a considerable salary, Robertson insists upon remaining himself.

"I have bought very few clothes," Dale says, "since I got out of the army in '46. I like nice clothes but don't wear them much. See this sport coat I'm wearing? Cost 26 bucks six years ago." (Continued on next page)

Dale proposed to Jackie the second time they dated, and they were married a month later. But a weekend was all the time Dale could spare for a wedding trip, so they're looking forward to a honeymoon!

he's going that-a-way! continued

Dale stays out of night clubs and fashionable hotels and wears a suit only on very special occasions such as his marriage. I'll probably wear one for the baby's baptism, too," he adds. (The Robertson's first baby is expected in June.) "Only there's not going to be any re-modeling around my house when the baby comes. We live in a tract house, one of those three-bedroom stucco jobs, kind of cocoa-colored, and I pay $58 a month rent. Bought the place under the G.I. bill, nothing down, four percent interest for 25 years. It's out in a place called Reseda, and it takes me exactly 35 minutes to get to the studio. My wife, Jackie, does all the cooking and cleaning. We have no maid, and I don't imagine we'll have a nurse, either. Biggest expense is to board the horses, but they make it back working in pictures."

Dale Robertson is an old horse-lover. He has five of them fattening up at Dick Dixon's Boarding Stable in Hollywood. And he has 24 other horses quartered on the ranch of Tex Newsome, a friend in Stillwater, Oklahoma.

"I'm in the movies for one reason," Dale explains. "Want to get enough money to buy a ranch."

Dale's mother says, "That boy isn't fooling, either. His lifetime ambition has been to own a ranch and become an Oklahoma cowboy. Even when he (Continued on page 81)

EVEN AS A YOUNGSTER, DALE WAS PRETTY

At 18 months, Dale bore the fancy moniker of Dayle LyMoine Robertson. The name came from a heroine, Kay LyMoine, who appeared in a novel that his mother had once read.

The snappy shoes and fashionable linen knickers Dale wears here are the result of his aunts' attempts to make a little gentleman out of him. Even at 10, Dale wanted to rebel.

Dale studied the violin for years just to please his aunts. But it finally paid off when he entered Oklahoma Military Academy and played fiddle in the band. (He's at extreme right.)

DETERMINED. HIS AUNTS WANTED HIM IN FANCY-PANTS, BUT COWBOY BOOTS HAD ALREADY WON HIS HEART.

Will Rogers, who once met Dale when he was a youngster, suggested: "Let me give him a screen test." But mother refused, thought he belonged home.

But no one could make a sissy out of him! He discarded fancy clothes as soon as he could and started acting rugged—even climbed Pike's Peak at 14.

Dale hasn't bought many new clothes since he was discharged from the army in '46. (He was a 2nd Lt. at 23.) Still wears a coat he bought then for $26.

Dale's a horse-and-dog lover, says he's in Hollywood for one reason: "to get enough money to buy my horses a ranch." His lifetime ambition has been to become a cowboy, although his fans are on the way to making him a movie idol.

Saturday night at

People used to sing that Saturday night was the loneliest night in the week—but not at Debbie's house, where everybody joins in making fudge and whoopee!

■ It was Debbie Reynolds to Bob Wagner on the phone. "Oh, lucky boy," she crooned. "I'll pick you up at half-past-eight, and don't forget to wear an apron." This invitation left Bob slightly confused, but not for many days, because that Saturday night Debbie was honking for him at the curb, and when he'd hopped into her jalopy she explained. "It's a turnabout party. You know—the men do all the work and the women have all the fun."

"I'm not coming," said Bob, but in a flash, he was at Debbie's place, staring into the woe-begone faces of Dick Anderson and Jeff Hunter. Dawn Addams, Barbara Rush (Jeff's wife) and Jeanette Johnson were grinning diabolically. "Nice to see you, Bob," said Dawn. "Got your cookbook?"

"I just remembered," said Bob. "I have a date with my dentist."

"Too late," giggled Debbie. "It's the galley for you. And while you're dreaming up something delectable we'll loll around."

The men went into a huddle. Maybe

Debbie's turnabout party got off with a giggle, dissolved into laughs. Only time the guests stopped talking was when they started eating.

Debbie's

they'd been taken (and wrapped up in white and popped into chef's caps) but they weren't beaten!

"What's easy?" murmured Dick.

"Sliced bananas," said Bob. "A snap."

"Oh," said Debbie, "I'm so hungry. I'd really go for filet mignon and Caesar salad."

"Would you go to Dave Chasen's?" asked Jeff. "I'll reserve a table."

"None of that," said Debbie. "You serve it, I'll eat it. But hurry!"

By this time Dick was halfway into the refrigerator. "I've got it!" he cried. "We'll start with ice cream. Delicious. Especially with pineapple sauce—canned."

"A mastermind," said Bob, admiringly.

"We'll end with ice cream," said Dawn Addams. "What's the main course?"

"Chop suey!" Dick exclaimed. "A child could make it! All he needs is a box of Chinese noodles and a little imagination."

"And a pot," added Debbie, presenting him with one the size of a bathtub.

"Dick plunked it on the stove. "Soy sauce!" he cried. "Celery! Rice! Mushrooms! Fast!" The girls scurried around following orders.

"That is chop suey?" asked Dawn.

"The best," said Dick. "Nothing but the best for you."

"What can no party be without?" Jeff asked suddenly.

"Guests," chirped his wife, Barbara.

"Fudge," said Jeff, "Creamy, delicious fudge. I'll make it. Do you have some cream cheese, Debbie?" (Continued on next page)

Holding her nose delicately, Dawn pooh-poohs Dick's chop suey. Once she got a taste of it, she changed her mind and cleaned the plate!

The "Philly" fudge recipe (see next page) was so easy that Jeff and Dick, who didn't know a ladle from a strainer, acted just like experts.

Barbara and Debbie dish out the toasted noodles while the boys give their chop suey a final once-over.

The fudge was all gone by the time Debbie's friend Jeannette Johnson got to it, but there were still plenty of laughs, and a coke or two.

After food came billiards for Dawn (see her in MGM's Hour of 13) and Dick (of MGM's Just This Once). Dick made the chop suey!

Bob (of With A Song In My Heart) led Debbie to drink! Her latest hit is Singin' In The Rain.

The fudge went like lightning when Debbie passed it around to Jeff Hunter (of Belles On Their Toes), his wife, Barbara, Bob, Dawn, Dick. Later, Deb ended up the turnabout party by driving Bob home in her 1929 Ford (right).

saturday night at debbie's continued

"Sure," said Debbie, dipping into the refrigerator and handing out a package. "From Philadelphia. Imported."

"Dick," directed Jeff, "melt some chocolate. Dawn—chop the pecans. Debbie—out of my way."

"It had better be good," warned Debbie. "That cheese was going to be my Sunday lunch."

But Jeff was concentrating—mixing, blending. "On second thought," he said, "you eat chop suey. I'll take fudge."

As it turned out, they all took everything.

"Maybe it's not chop suey," said Dawn, eating it gingerly. "Was the recipe in the original chinese?"

"Try the fudge," said Jeff.

"Go away," moaned Dawn. But Debbie was game. So were Barbara and the chefs. "Delicious," they chorused.

"I'll have some," said Jeanette. But she was too late.

After the food came billiards, music and a lot of talk. And the hours flew by. "Okay," said Debbie wearily. "I guess we'll take you guys home—or your mothers'll worry."

"Do we have to?" asked Dawn.

"Turnabout," grinned Dick Anderson. "And I may even let you kiss me goodnight!"

So Dawn took him home—and he did. THE END

DEBBIE'S "PHILLY" FUDGE

1 3-oz. pkg. Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese (or 6 level tbsps. from the ½-lb. pkg.)
2 cups sifted confectioners' sugar
2 1-oz. squares melted unsweetened chocolate
¼ teaspoon vanilla
Dash of salt
½ cup chopped pecans

■ Place cheese in bowl and cream it until soft. Blend in sugar slowly. Add melted chocolate. Mix well. Add vanilla, salt and pecans; mix until well blended. Press into well-greased pan. Place in refrigerator until firm (about 15 minutes). Cut into squares. (For softer fudge, blend 1 tsp. cream.) Recipe can be revised for Maple, Almond, Coconut, or Peanut Butter Philly-fudge.

THE BEAUTIFUL BRAIN TRUST

Hollywood likes 'em pretty and never mind the brain—so Jeanne Crain thought she'd play it smart by acting dumb. She did so well she almost fooled herself!

BY FRANCES CLARK

■ When George Nader, a young actor whom Jeanne Crain discovered, was being interviewed recently for facts about his life, he pulled an unusual switch. He didn't want to talk about himself. He wanted to talk about Jeanne. "She's so intelligent!" he exclaimed. "Bring up any subject—art, music, literature, philosophy, anything—and she'll know how to talk about it. A couple of times I thought I'd outsmart her—boned up on something obscure and sprung it on her. She sprung right back with an answer. What a woman!"

George Nader doesn't stand alone in his ecstatic admiration. Everyone in Hollywood —including those important people who cast the movies—are beginning to realize that the girl Jeanne used to be—the ever-sweet ingenue with nothing but light, gay thoughts in her pretty head, isn't there anymore. Jeanne has emerged as a beautiful, mature woman, and, as if this weren't enough, she's revealed a brain with a special glow of its own.

You may wonder how it happened, how such a radical change could occur. Well, to reverse the self-descriptive phrase of another Hollywood beauty, you can say that until recently Jeanne has outwardly appeared as little more than a charming child, while inwardly she has had the emotions of a woman. It just took a little doing to coax her hidden talents to the surface.

if he were only single

In fact, the tall, pretty gal who smiled contentedly and whisked Ricardo off home got him before Hollywood did—and that could be one reason why Ricardo's a domesticated screen romancer, and also a conflicting blend of North-and-South-of-the-border traits.

Ricardo's Castilian Spanish is a melodiously perfect thing to hear—yet his English is slangily native. He's a typical American husband who forgets his wedding anniversary, yet if he's away from home even overnight Georgiana gets purple passage telegrams that make the Western Union girls giggle. He lets his wife buy his ties and banish him to the bathroom to plunk his guitar, yet he disdainfully refuses to step a foot in the kitchen—no place for a caballero. He rules his children with austere Spanish discipline, yet he dolls them out in "Hoppy" rigs and grins indulgently when they rip up the rugs. The girls, Laura and Anita, could be dusky cherubs in a Velasquez canvas, but tow-headed Mark might be a farm kid from Kansas.

Ricardo worries about the high cost of living and taxes, still he brings home extravagant trinkets like solid gold manicure sets for Georgie. He's emotionally moved to tears by a bull fight, but yells "Murder the bum!" like any home grown fight fan at a boxing bout. He greets everyone he knows—male or female—with a rib crushing embraco, yet he blushes like a country boy when actresses call him "Honey." He likes the correct wine with his meals, but orders hamburgers with the works when he lunches out.

This man-of-two-worlds makeup puzzles most of the people Ricardo meets in Hollywood, but it doesn't seem strange at all to Ricardo—and with good reason. He's been shuttling back and forth between Mexico and the U.S.A. ever since he was out of knee pants and while officially a Mexican citizen, he couldn't truthfully tell you which place is home, although his afficionados down South sure can. It was almost an international incident when he deserted Mexican films for Hollywood and they still rumble resentfully down there. As one fiery critic at the time wrote—"The Yanquis take everything. First the silver, then the oil and now Ricardo Montalban!"

That good neighborly piracy took place back in 1944. It was in Mexico City that Jack Cummings, an MGM producer, arrived on a very special mission hunting a very special man. He looked up his old friend, Norman Foster, who was directing movies down there.

"Norm," he said, "I want the best looking, sexiest, most graceful and dashing actor in Mexico who can play a bullfighter with Esther Williams in Fiesta. He's got to be—"

"Come on-a my house," interrupted Norm. "Got something to show you."

What Norm had to show were a flock of films he'd made with Ricardo—some of them bullfighters—but after a couple Jack Cummings didn't need to see any more. "That's my boy!" he said. "Where is he?"

"Oh, a few blocks from you."

"Well, call him—get him over here!" demanded Jack, but Norm shook his head.

"I can't. I mean, he's a few blocks from you—in Hollywood. He's just married my sister-in-law, Georgiana."

Norm didn't explain the way Ricardo had married her, which was romantically Latin. Only two weeks after they'd met they'd eloped secretly to Tijuana, Mexico. Then, taking Georgie back to Hollywood, he raced off to Mexico City, to make a film to support her. This was after a two day honeymoon! When Ricardo headed stateside again and blessed the union properly in the Catholic church of their faiths, Georgie was pregnant and the altar boys gave the bride and groom questioning stares. "It was a little embarrassing for everyone concerned," Ricardo allows.

But even then Ricardo chased back to Mexico for another picture, came home to Hollywood again just a week before his baby, Laura, was born. And after a while he took Georgie on a belated honeymoon to—Acapulco, Mexico! Right at this moment, after a stretch in Hollywood, he ought to be down Mexico way making Mexican Village with his brother-in-law, Norman Foster.

All this international commuting is strictly okay with Montalban. He loves both countries and both ways of life passionately. He has strong family ties and fervent fans in both places, and a career, too, in either climate if he wants it. In fact, he can make more money today in income tax-free Mexico than he can where Uncle Sam takes his cut, although he's not thinking of reversing the deal. But sometimes he admits "I feel like a jumping bean"—the way his double track, back-and-forth life has gone and keeps on going.

It started November 25, 1920, in Mexico City where his parents, Ricardo and Jenara Montalban, had emigrated from Castile. The Montalbans are of aristocratic lineage, descended from the Conte de Montalban, which means roughly "White Mountain." Being a textile man, Senor Montalban soon gravitated to what Mexicans call "Land of the White Gold"—the cotton country around Torreon farther North. That's where Ricardo, the baby of the family, grew up—a brown-eyed, sensitive almost too-beautiful boy.

At the Torreon school, where he went until he was 14, it was all right, but when he came to the States to school, Ricardo was a tempting target. He spoke the elegant Castile brand of Spanish, unlike his schoolmates, and his parents togged him out in traditionally tailored Spanish outfits—short pants, wool hose, coat, white collar, and beret. After getting them ripped off a few times Ricardo begged his folks for a change but it was no go.

"They were traditional people," he explains, "And I was like the American boy beginning his school days and a friend told his father, 'Now that your son's starting school, you ought to buy him an Encyclopedia.' 'The hell with him,' replied the father. 'Let him walk to school like I did!' "

So he had to take it, but summers, on his dad's rancho, he practically grew up on horseback, and spent his days hunting rattlesnakes. He bagged and skinned about 30, and finally grew into a wiry, muscular kid who could rattle off the local lingo and handle himself in a scrap. He still can, as you know if you saw him throw leather in Right Cross. But when he was packed off to the Ecole Francais in Mexico City, all this country culture made the city kids size him up as a hick. And because he had a high uncontrollable cowlick which made his noggin shape up like a dirigible, they tagged him "Zeppelin."

"Zep" Montalban wasn't too happy as an Ecole internado. In fact, most of his life, Ricardo's been some kind of a Displaced Person, until now he's used to it. "All my life I've had to go all out to make friends," he says a little wistfully. But before he really had a chance to get adjusted at the Catholic Ecole Francais, the church-baiting Cardenas regime closed it down.

Back in Torreon, Ricardo was placed in a business school and because he was sharp

During the dark hours of war in Italy, faith walked beside me like a devoted friend. I learned then to live without fear.

I live with prayer

by Pier Angeli

■ If it were not that I had within me a comfort, a way of knowing what my life is and what I must do with it, I would be in much trouble now with my family.

Supposing in Italy I wrote that I was 19 and had never been on a date without a chaperon—it would not be considered unusual at all. This would be true of a lot of unmarried girls there of that age. In this country I know that it will be a little hard to believe and many girls will feel sorry for me. I know they consider me something like a freak—it comes out in their eyes, and in the eyes of boys, too, when they meet me and hear about it.

I watch from my windows and I can see how here the boy drives up in front of a girl's house and blows his horn . . . and pretty soon she comes dancing out and they drive away to the beach to spend the whole day together. I see them in cars at night, the boy in tuxedo and the girl in something special. That's pretty nice. Don't think I wouldn't like it. But I do not let myself get desperate and defy my mother. To want something is not sufficient reason for having it in the way I have lived . . . and I have long ago chosen to live in the church.

The church does not say I must agree with my mother. I do not in this instance. I say to her that 25 mothers would not keep a girl proper if she did not want to be proper. And she could live in the middle of an army camp and not be bad if she were really good. But the (Continued on page 85)

(Continued from page 63) at mathematics, headed for an accountant's career in commerce. But that didn't take, so his dad planted him in a dry goods store owned by a friend. "For 40 pesos a month," Ricardo remembers, "I almost went nuts, taking inventories, filling orders and pasting labels on packages." A year and a half later he was up to 75 pesos, but the letters he wrote to his big brother, "Chu-Chu," in Hollywood grew increasingly desperate. And Chu-Chu was a kindred rebel soul.

At that point, Carlos Montalban, as the family knew Chu-Chu, was plugging Carta Blanca beer in Hollywood. But before that, he'd tried a fling at a movie career himself, although he never got the real break he wanted and was a little bitter about it. When he drove down to Torreon and brought his little brother up to live with him and try some American schools, the whole idea was like Heaven opening up to Ricardo. He didn't have his eyes on Hollywood fame, exactly, but "I was a terrific movie fan," he confesses "and everything I saw about America I worshipped—the streets, the houses, the people, the pretty girls—ah, those girls!"

He met them at Belmont High and then Fairfax High in Los Angeles, where he also picked up the American language and customs and something else just as important—a crystal clear idea of what he wanted to do. That happened through some school plays, one of which, Tovarich, moved an MGM talent scout to offer a screen test. But Carlos vetoed that idea pronto, clear from New York, where he'd gone with the beer business, leaving Ricardo with a family friend.

"Over my dead body," Chu-Chu replied to the news. "They won't do to you what they did to me in Hollywood. Get graduated and then come back here where I can keep an eye on you." Which is what Ricardo did, dutifully, although packing an idea along that his brother didn't know about, but soon discovered. It was Broadway and acting, of course, and when Ricardo tearfully spilled his ambitions, Chu-Chu remembered the same youthful symptoms and relented.

But Broadway wasn't such a soft touch. It never is. And Ricardo Montalban's saga there was the same old story. A good-looking, eager-eyed guy, like a thousand others, with nothing to sell but youth and those looks—and him a foreigner besides. Luckily, he had a place to sleep and enough to eat but his feet got sore and his pants glossy just the same, pounding the pavements, climbing stairs and sitting hours in offices until people barked "Goodbye, now. Don't call us—we'll call you"—but never did. That's when he took those extra jobs in "soundies," at the Edison Studios on Long Island, "which," Ricardo points out, "is just about as low as you can get in show business, isn't it?"

He promoted a few stage bits at last—one as a butler in Nancy's Private Affair and another in My Sister Eileen. Then one day an agent lifted the telephone receiver in his office where Ricardo was parked, "at liberty" as usual.

"Yes," he said. "I see—I see. I'll be right over." He turned to Ricardo, "Come on," he said, "you go, too." He didn't say where but when they opened the door in a swank Eastside apartment building there was Tallulah Bankhead with a long cigarette holder, a frown and a pet lion cub.

"Dahling," she cried, slapping her brow. "You've got to get me a new man. I tell you, the boy you sent is horrible. He can't even remember his lines. Get me somebody else—anybody and right now."

"How about Montalban here?" suggested the agent, motioning to Rick.

"Sit down," waved Tallulah and Ricardo did. The lion bounded over and bit him on the foot, tearing his shoe, which was a touch of tragedy, because it was the only pair he had. La Bankhead ignored this and so did Ricardo—he smelled a job. "Can you remember lines?" she demanded. "Dahling—all I ask is that you remember lines!"

He got the job—a croupier in Her Cardboard Lover starting the next night. So he went home with his "sides" and stayed up all night, swilling coffee to learn them. Then he slept through the day and hustled over to the theater—no rehearsal, and he'd forgotten to shave. They practically pushed him out on the stage when his cue came, with Tallulah frowning in the other wing. On stage, Ricardo blanked out in terror. Maybe it was all of 15 seconds, but it seemed like an hour to him. He stared at the audience, they laughed. Then the lights flashed on again in his brain. There wasn't anything to it. "Very nice, Dahling," said Tallu, "but don't try to pinch my scenes with those goo-goo eyes again. And, by the way, tomorrow night—would you like to borrow my razor?"

She was nice to him from then on, gave him tips, polished him up, even took him out to Coney Island for some lovey-dovey publicity poses. Next summer Ricardo did stock in Maine, came back to Broadway for a nice comedy hit in Our Betters and made a test. But he never learned how it came out and still doesn't know. Because about then there was a call from Torreon. "Mother's very ill, an operation. Get packed," said Carlos. And Ricardo was back where he started from.

WELL, to tuck up a tale, that anxious homecoming is why Ricardo is where he is and what he is today. After his mother was out of danger, he went down to Mexico City for a look at the new movie industry which was having a boom. The minute he stepped on a set he was snapped up for a part in Five Were Chosen, playing a soldier boy with Maria Elena Marques, later Gable's Indian girlfriend in Across The Wide Missouri. In his very first screen job Ricardo made the senoritas swoon. But it was Santa, the second, that really counted—in more ways than one. Because Norman Foster directed that and Norm's wife is Sally Blane, one of the beautiful Hollywood tribe of young sisters which includes Loretta Young—and Georgiana.

"I'd never seen anything like Ricardo," Norman recalls today. "He had the boyish charm and beauty that Ty Power started with and the sex appeal of a young Gable. He was all I had dreamed of being when I was an actor—and I wanted to make him be what I never was." After Santa they teamed up for a parade of Mexican hits until muchachas actually slept on the doorstep of his apartment and pelted him with flowers in the street. Norm thought this was wonderful but his wife, Sally, thought it was a shame. She had a better idea which she sat down and wrote to Georgiana back in Hollywood.

"I have your husband all picked out for you, Darling," she scribbled. But Georgie wrote back, "—no thanks, no romantic Spaniards for me. I've already got me a nice solid American guy." So Sally worked it the other way round. She told Ricardo, "Look—I've got only one unmarried sister left—and you've just got to be in the family!"

"I would love to meet her," Montalban replied gallantly.

"You will," grinned Norm Foster. "Sally'll see to that. You haven't got a chance with that Young gang." Which was very true talk, because if ever a Cupid levelled down with dead aim, Sally did.

Next time the Fosters went North, Ricardo went too and Sally didn't even risk letting her prize run loose at a hotel—she routed him right to the guest room of her sister Polly Ann's house, set up a date with Georgie the first day and kept a sharp eye on the proceedings. It looked pretty good when, after their luncheon date, Ricardo strolled Georgie over to Saks Beverly and bought her two cashmere sweaters. But there were some hitches. Georgie still had that nice solid American guy. Sally thought she knew how to break that up. She knew what a wonderful dancer Georgie was and how she loved it. She made reservations for two at Mocambo. When you dance with Ricardo Montalban and your heart's not completely lassoed, something's bound to give. Georgie's heart did, faster than Sally suspected. In fact, Sally didn't even know they'd gotten married until both she and Ricardo were back on a set in Mexico City, and then her match-making triumph was tarnished somewhat by an interesting tale Ricardo told and still tells—

He says that years ago in New York he clipped a picture of Georgie out of Harper's Bazaar (she was a model) and carried it next to his heart all those years not knowing who she was. Ricardo swears it's true but Georgie still has some doubts. When she asked for the cherished clipping, Ricardo produced all right, but another tumbled out of his wallet at the same time.

"Ginger Rogers," smiles Georgie. "I think he had an album of dream girls, if you ask me."

In any event, today the Montalbans, seven years married, are still one of those blissful couples who restore your faith in Hollywood marriages, although that marriage got off to such a crazy start. And even the second time, after doing it right religiously, there was a slight complication.

Georgie's mother, Mrs. Belzer, gave them her apartment in Westwood to start housekeeping. She's a busy decorator and inclined to move things in and out. So when they came home that night—well—there wasn't any bed.

"A fine thing," cried Ricardo. "Even after I marry you in the church your mother moves out the bed!"

By now Ricardo and Georgie have a big Monterey style house—with beds, and with children—Laura, Mark and Anita, six, four and two. And there'll be another Montalban (Phillip, if it's a boy), sometime in April. Most of Ricardo's private life revolves around his home and children.

In some ways, the protracted holidays between film assignments are a blessing to the private life of the Montalbans and in others an ordeal. Ricardo is wound up like a two-dollar watch. As his pal, Jimmy Whitmore, puts it, "He always acts as if he's running a temperature of 102!" When he isn't working to earn his pay, Ricardo growls, "I feel like a kept man!"

To ease his conscience and calm his ambition to "grow as an actor" Ricardo shows up every day at the studio, work-or-not, still ironing out traces of accent with coach Gertrude Fogeler, or rehearsing with the new kids on the lot. There isn't a starlet signed at Metro in the past two years that he hasn't helped with a test, just because he likes to. With Jim Whitmore and some of those young actors and actresses he's formed an experimental group to cook up plays for their own amusement and training. But that leaves a lot of Ricardo's nervous energies still to burn.

So if he isn't splashing in some friend's swimming pool or lacing a tennis ball, he's banging his guitar or restlessly snatching any loose gadget he can get his hands on around the house to take apart and put together again. He grinds out Spanish music constantly—he has his set of Mexican records and Georgie hers, the Yankee swing kind. But in either case, like as not whatever Mrs. Montalban finds herself doing, she'll be swept soon or later into a rhumba or tango right in the living room even if she has a broom in her hand.

At such times, in self-defense, she suggests a movie—even in broad daylight, knowing perfectly well that it might wind up three movies, or maybe four, as happened not long ago, starting at 11 in the morning and carrying through the night. Then there are drives and picnics to fall back on with the kids and if the family can't join him Ricardo roars off to the beach and storms up and down the surf alone to work off an explosive energy that as Georgie laughs, "leaves the Montalbans without fear of an atomic bomb. We've already got one."

What works best to relax Ricardo is a strenuous physical exercise, and curiously now that's doctor's orders—ever since a bronco he was riding on location for Across The Wide Missouri bucked and slammed him down with a rock under his spine. It raised a painful bump and right after that Ricardo's left leg began to act up. It's still partly numb here and there and he can't use it in some postures. What's more, the doctors have told him unless he exercises it faithfully and long every day, it might wind up paralyzed. So now there's a weight lifting session at the gym, and corrective calisthentics, working or not. That takes care of some excess steam, besides keeping every one of that beautiful "symphony of muscles," as one smitten fan describes them, oiled and in top trim.

However, the accident hasn't kept Ricardo and Georgie from their favorite family sport—dancing—although with the multiplying brood they don't get around much with the gay set these days. Usually it's dinner and an evening of canasta (they introduced that Argentine card craze to Hollywood and are experts) with the friends they see most—Jim and Nancy Whitmore, Marsh and Barbara Thompson, and Geary Steffen and Jane Powell. And then there's the clannish, close knit Young family, five couples and 15 kids, with birthdays, anniversaries and something going every holiday of the year and in between.

At a recent Thanksgiving dinner, Loretta wrote out the place cards for all of the clan: "Dear Lord, thank you for Sally and her sympathy." And another "Dear Lord, thank You for Georgie and her humor." But for Georgie's husband Loretta wrote, "Dear Lord, thank You for Ricardo and his wonderful warmth."

That's one way, and a sincere one, of saying what Ricardo Montalban does to everyone who catches a spark of his charm, close at hand.

Last year, down in Puerto Rico, on a flying Film Festival jaunt, Ricardo and Georgie were riding through the streets of San Juan and most of its population turned out to see the famous Hollywood stars. There were cheers for them all—but when Ricardo rolled by a girl screamed a remark in Spanish that set the crowd roaring.

"What did she say?" Georgie asked Ricardo.

Ricardo grinned, "You really want to know?" Georgie really did.

"She said," Ricardo blushed, " 'Oh, you beautiful gumdrop, you!' " THE END

(Ricardo Montalban can soon be seen in MGM's The Story Of Three Loves.—Ed.)

little miss lonely heart

Ann was too gentle to announce that for her, the part had to be younger—but presto, it was rewritten younger.

The film, with Robert Mitchum in the male lead, was shooting up in cold, mountainous country. Ann murmured something about its being inaccessible. Immediately a Hughes plane was at her service, with Mr. Hughes standing by to fly it.

Ann smiled gratefully. This was all so charming and thoughtful but the truth was that she was tired. She'd been working steadily. The "loanout" money she would earn from The Korean Story wouldn't come to her but to her studio, Universal-International. This extra picture, therefore, would mean no profit.

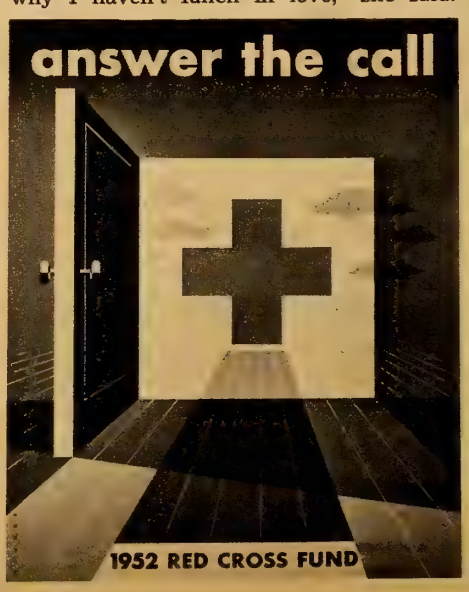
So Mr. Hughes gave her a swimming pool. Then it seemed she'd be needed a week earlier than she'd thought—so she got the Cadillac.

Then, of course, as Ann always does, she went in and gave a great performance. She has never been a veteran's wife, but then, she has never been a suspected murderess which she played in Thunder On The Hill or Caruso's wife, or anything at all like Veda Pierce, who chopped up life so terribly for her mother, Mildred. But Ann, always sensitive and very wise can portray other people's emotions, and she can transmute some of the unhappiness she felt as a very little child, into a flawless acting job.

ROBERT MITCHUM, came away from the production full of respect for Ann, and few people really earn his respect. Hughes came away singing her praises and so did the director. As for Universal-International—who got her when she was 14, with nine solid years of acting triumphs behind her—they were prouder than ever. Yet this time their pride had a new basis; they realized that this "loanout" represented a new side of Ann. To put it bluntly, it was the first time Ann had shown that she was aware of herself as an important star, and had negotiated in a most ladylike way, a very smart deal for herself.

Now, if to top this, she would just fall in love with a millionaire, or even a hundred-thousand-dollar-man, her studio would go berserk with happiness. But there's the rub. Ann doesn't fall in love with anybody. On-screen she is fiery, passionate and beautiful. Off screen she is spiritual, unaffected, and virtuous.

This is a little baffling to Hollywoodites. She could be out every night of her sweet young life, if she chose. Plenty of nice boys constantly telephone her. Plenty of not-quite-so-nice boys have telephoned her, too. Ann gives them all the same treatment. She says that she and Aunt Cis and Uncle Pat are going to be home all evening. Would the caller like to come over for some good talk, and a few records, and some especially delicious ice cream?



One evening a particularly bold young man-about-town turned up at her house, unannounced and definitely uninvited. He bore long-stemmed roses, and his convertible, at the curb, was nearly as long as Ann's whole house. But her Uncle Pat told him off so fast that he left in ten seconds flat. With the roses.

When Ann does date it is with Dick Clayton, whom she has known since they were both kids in the Professional Children's School in New York. Or whenever he's in town on furlough, she goes out with Dick Long, her friend of nine years' standing, or Roddy MacDowall, who was a child star when she was. Even Scott Brady, with whom Ann went to the Press Photographers' Ball as Sadie Thompson, the shady lady, was driven to writing high-flown poetry about her. Ordinarily, as Scott would be the last to deny, he just has that certain gleam in his eye when he looks at a beautiful girl. With Ann, he became reverent.

Add all that together and you haven't even the vestige of romance. Yet to be 23 and beautiful and visibly emotional and not have romance . . . what goes?

I put the question bluntly to Ann one rainy, spring day recently. She had just finished The World In His Arms with Gregory Peck.

She said, speaking thoughtfully, as she always does, "I don't blame Hollywood for hunting a romance in my life. Any girl like myself, who's become a public character through her work, gets dreamed into a plot." She smiled. "I do want to be a typical heroine in real life, eventually. Sometime, and soon, I hope, I want to marry and I very much want children. But now. . ." she paused, thinking it through. Then after a long silence, she burst out laughing. "I never realized this before but maybe I've got the answer to why I haven't fallen in love," she said.

"It isn't that I put my career first. I've been working ever since I was five, so I'm used to that. But through my work, I get the chance to blow off all the emotions that many girls store up in day dreams.

"Take the dream of traveling, for instance. My work sent me to England, and gave me the chance to go to Ireland. It let me meet President Roosevelt and gave me the opportunity to get to Rome and have an audience with His Holiness, the Pope. My whole life will be enriched by those meetings."

She paused again, thoughtfully. "I know that the emotions I experience in love scenes are vicarious," she said. "I even realize it is learning about life vicariously, but still for the moment I do experience emotion, and through script writers and the like I certainly have encountered some extraordinary points of view."

"Lately you have been wildly vicarious then," I said. "To jump from that undressed lady of the Crusades in The Golden Horde to anything so modern as a young veteran's wife in The Korean Story and then to being a Russian Countess in Gregory Peck's arms takes a bit of doing."

"A bit of dressing, too," said Ann. "Those clothes I wore in my scenes with Greg really thrilled me."

"And heaven help the average boy," I said, "who, on a date with you, has to compete with the polished speeches that Greg or Mario Lanza or Bob Mitchum make to you in your love scenes."

"Oh, now," said Ann, in gentle reproof. Then she grinned. "I would like to meet the man who could compete with all that." Again she paused, and her mood changed. "Something seems to hold me back," she said. Could it be the lack of a very superior, intelligent, subtle, handsome man? Until such a man (if such a man exists) comes along Ann will go on being warm—but impersonal. This seems likely, for Ann Blyth is Hollywood's true "good" girl and the whole town loves her for it.

One day recently a gown had been designed for Ann which she didn't like. Typically, she didn't rant or make faces. She just walked quietly away from wardrobe, visibly downcast.

Immediately the whole place was in an uproar, and two days later, she has a newly-designed gown. This time, when it was shown to her, Ann beamed, "Oh, aren't you good to me? Aren't you good to me?"

The difference between Ann Blyth of today and the child of yesterday is that now she is mature enough to know that her consideration produces this result with people. Her strength is that she is wise enough not to use this power except subtly.

For the moment, her life is full but not fulfilled. But when a man comes into her life, who is neither wolf nor saint, but very strong, richly human and understanding, then watch this Little Miss Lonely Heart! She'll know how to turn romance into a wonderful, real-life story.

THE END

"Longest split-second of my life!"

"I had to hold this 'fast action' trapeze shot for what seemed hours," Betty Hutton explained, "and repeat the pose again and again with the ropes chafing my hands. You can easily imagine how red and raw and sore that left them!

"I used 'chalk' on my hands so's not to slip. It's a resin a hundred times more drying than household cleansers. Believe me, Jergens Lotion was a blissful relief after such a session.

"De Mille awarded me a lucky half-dollar, 'for performance beyond the call of duty.' And Jergens Lotion deserves one for fast performance. See why: Smooth one hand with Jergens . . .

"apply any lotion or cream to the other. Then wet them. Water won't 'bead' on hand smoothed with Jergens as it will with an oily care.

"Close-ups demand romantic hands, so no wonder Jergens Lotion is preferred by screen stars 7 to 1. It's such a quick, easy beauty care!"

Keep your hands lovely too. Jergens gives complete protection against roughness and chap. Yet Jergens Lotion only costs 10¢ to $1, plus tax.

(Continued from page 51) matter? Was it true that his skin was as thin as an onion's, was he really hot-headed with a chip on his shoulder big as a house? Some people said he was; maybe these things proved it. But—didn't they know that for two punishing months he'd been mauled by a squad of gridiron bruisers from UCLA and Southern Cal, got a concussion and a black-and-blue body that finally earned their respect by saying nothing and taking it? Didn't he have a right to get sore at such cracks?

Most people would say that, being a movie star and a public celebrity, John Derek didn't; that he should have grinned and taken it, risen above it, brushed it off. But most people couldn't possibly realize, of course, that Saturday's Hero wasn't just a picture job to him. It was a painful chunk out of his life. Most people just don't know John Derek, or how he figures himself in the ride to fame that his fabulously handsome face has handed him. And that includes the people in his home town of Hollywood, who live around him and work with him and who should know better by now.

"Look, John," his drama coach, Benno Schneider, will tell him sometimes. "Take it easier. Go ahead and ham it up now and then. Don't tear yourself to pieces being so intensely honest all the time. . ."

But he can't. He's not built that way. "I can't play a part unless it's honest."

"Now this is easy—there's nothing to it," a publicity man will assure him on entering a theater. "Just go out there, say hello and talk to the folks." But suddenly he'll have a sore throat, a very real sore throat. "Are you sure they want me?"

"Of course they do!"

"Billy Eckstine's on the bill, too. They came to see him, not me." And only when they've mobbed and hugged him and roared his name does he finally believe they like him. Then he feels okay. His sore throat's gone.

"Come on, John, give us a smile," says the studio still man. "Got your curls in place?"

"Yeah—I just had my Toni," answers John, smiling obligingly. But there's no laugh in his voice. It's not really funny.

NICK RAY, the director, took him aside when he made Knock On Any Door, almost four years ago. "This is the scene that makes or breaks your performance, John," he said. "When you choke the D.A. I want you to fly into a rage, scream, go to pieces—cry."

"Nick," John protested, "I don't know acting tricks. I can't cry."

Nick knew what to do. He took John aside in a quiet corner of the set and relentlessly intoned, "You hate cops . . . you hate cops . . . you hate cops. . ." And each time he said it, for a half hour or more, he slammed John hard in the back with his fist. Nick's a big man; the blows hurt, and so did the indignity. "All right," Nick finally signalled the camera crew, "move in. John's ready." His eyes were flooded, his voice wild. He went into the scene and it was great. But then he couldn't stop. He sobbed for an hour and Nick had to lead him to his dressing room and calm him down.

"Acting with me," John Derek will tell you, "is rough."

That's an understatement. Acting with John Derek is living the hard way. He's psychologically unprepared for it. That's why he's touchy. All his life he's been a fiercely independent, dead honest guy—and still is. Yet there he is making his living in the stereotyped, artificial world of Hollywood. Any psychiatrist could tell you that's what's eating John Derek. That's why being a movie star is rough on him—and maybe always will be.

Let's start at the beginning. . . .

John Derek never wanted to be an actor, even though he was born in Hollywood, and his mother was an actress. She called herself Dolores Dorian or sometimes Dolores Johnson when she worked for Cecil B. DeMille and Hal Roach and his dad, Lawson Harris, was a promoter mixed up in everything—acting, directing, writing—but mainly animated cartoons. His fortunes went up and down and so did his wife's. But about all of this their son, Derek Harris (for that was his name) knew practically nothing and cared less.

Once when his mother took him along to a Paramount set, he blinked uncomfortably at the bright lights, hated the noise, the stuffy stage and all the glamorous people. "Let's get out of here, Mother," he begged, "let's go home."

What Dare Harris wanted to be was just one thing; he wanted to be an all-male man. He wanted horses and guns and dogs and a lot of room around him. He wanted to be physically tough and capable and strong. Maybe he wanted to be that more than most kids. Because his mother, who was almost a blonde copy of Dolores Del Rio, and his dad, who had lean chiselled features and a debonair air, were both beautiful people. "I knew I was pretty," John will tell you. "People told me so. And I guess that's the reason I reached for everything rugged around me to prove to myself and everyone else that I was no sis."

He had every opportunity for that. A lot of tears have been spilled over John Derek's insecure childhood. His father and mother were divorced when he was five and home for him was a shifting, unstable place. Part of the time he lived with his mother, part with his dad. Sometimes he was on his own, at a private school or a camp or at the ranch of Russ Harlan, an old friend of the family. But in a lot of ways his was an enviable boyhood, at least from his own viewpoint. His folks treated him like a grownup, and he usually got what he wanted.

He got a .22 rifle when he was hardly big enough to pack it. But he was the kind of kid you could trust with a gun and he learned to be a dead shot. He could pick off hawks in the air and drill quail on the rise. He got a pistol later and a horse, and he would hang tin cans up in the eucalyptus trees on his dad's place and thunder by on his horse, shooting under its belly like an Indian, and knocking them down.

He hated school; it was too confining. He'd show up the first day, then stay away two weeks, until they caught him, and expelled him. He went to eight private schools in all and four public ones. He wasn't a troublemaker—unless you objected to his trait of hauling his schoolmates home and boxing their ears off—but he just wasn't interested in classes. His mother would promise him a summer at Catalina, or Big Bear, or Lake Arrowhead if he'd buckle down to math. And she always delivered, whether he did or not. He climbed Sierra cliffs that would make him dizzy today, and dived for pennies when the tourist boats pulled into Avalon.

For a year or so he had a tutor and just traveled around in a car and that was perfectly swell. The tutor, "Mister Dean," as John remembers him, was a kindly soul, more of a companion than a master. They rolled all over California with the school books. They went to Palm Springs, camping in the canyons, and Dare killed hundreds of rattlesnakes with his .22 and shot eagles with a bow and arrow. They rambled to all the scenic spots with their sleeping bags and down to Russ Harlan's ranch where there were horses. He learned to break them in and gentle them. He got tossed more times than he can remember—and there was a thing about that: If anyone saw him tumble—especially if they laughed—he'd turn purple with anger and hate them.

So that's the way Dare Harris grew up. He loved that name, by the way; it suggested "I dare you." He welcomed every dare and every scrap, win or lose, because it gave him an exultant feeling to test his strength and skill. But for what end he had absolutely no idea. Sometimes he'd think he wanted to paint. Other times, he thought it was a ranch he wanted to run. Never once did he think about Hollywood or anything as exhibitionistic or unreal as acting.

How it happened has been well told. Dare was riding in the Santa Monica hills one day near his dad's ranch when Tom Moore, the old silent star, then drama coach at Fox, saw how he looked in levis, flat sombrero and high heels and recognized a potential movie hero. He talked him into a test and nothing came of that, but then Henry Willson, David Selznick's talent scout, caught Dare bowling one night in a Westwood alley and offered him $150 a week, just to join Selznick's Cinderella gang—Guy Madison, Rory Calhoun. That was a fad of Selznick's then, rounding up good-looking unknowns and processing them to fill the young man shortage of wartime Hollywood.

"Sure," said Dare, not stopping his game, "why not?" That was a lot of money at 17; he could use it. He had his eye on a brace of expensive setters and a new shotgun. "Why not?" was as good a reason as any why Dare Harris took a crack at the movies in the first place. He didn't earn it, didn't want it, didn't know anything about it, but he did know, rather resentfully, that the only reason in God's world it happened to him was because of his face, which he happened to hate.

So the whole thing began as an easy dodge. Oh, he showed up at acting classes with Helena Sorrell like the rest of the new kids but he wasn't interested. The big day for Dare was payday. Then he and his pal, Tom Devlin, would round up a few girls and go out for some fun—without leaving a thought behind at the studio.

It wasn't a big thrill to him, only mildly annoying, when they called him for a job one day in I'll Be Seeing You. He sat at a table feeling silly and self-conscious. Togged out in an Air Corps lieutenant's uniform but still looking like the high school kid he was, he was told to watch Shirley Temple come into the room and sigh "Beautiful!" It was the first acting job of his life. And he was terrible.

He tried again and again. "Look at her!" screamed his director, teutonic William Dieterle. "She's beautiful, isn't she? You think she's beautiful, don't you?" . . .

"I guess," said Dare. He thought she was pretty. He knew her and liked her. In fact, he was dating Shirley then and he didn't know a nicer kid. But he couldn't honestly feel she was beautiful. The director threw up his hands. By now he'd been at it three hours. One simple word. And this stubborn, stupid kid couldn't say it right.

"All right," he thundered, leaning heavily on the table. "Say 'keen'—say 'swell'—say 'nice'—say any of your childish expressions—but mean it, mean it!" Then he stalked across the set shaking his fists in the air. "Why," cried the director for all the set to hear, "why do they give me this awkward amateur and hold up my whole picture—just to start his career?"

William Dieterle has probably forgotten that incident long ago, maybe that very afternoon. Probably he had a right to his rage, he had to come up with a picture. But John Derek hasn't forgotten. It reels through his memory still, and everytime he steps before a camera he says to himself, "This has got to be real, you've got to feel it, you've got to believe. . ." And that can tear a guy's insides to pieces if he can't believe it and he's not the kind to make false faces.

But back then—and that was eight years ago—it only made him burn inside with shame and resentment—mostly at himself, although he didn't know it. He wanted to shake the whole racket, clear out. And soon, of course, he did. Uncle Sam saw to that. For the next couple of years Private Harris rattled around Japan, Korea, the Philippines and Burma as an airborne trooper, six months in combat, the rest in occupation.

He loved army life, the action, the physical exertion, the rough clothes. Nobody eyed his looks, his curls were butchered and he usually was sweaty and mussed. But when the war was really over and all the GIs started worrying about their jobs and getting them back, Derek knew it wouldn't be rough for him—not with that face. He signed a contract at Fox the day after he got home. There was nothing to it, not even a test. He got $200 a week and he hasn't missed a paycheck in Hollywood since.

For the record, Derek Harris did nothing constructive at Fox, except attend some drama classes, lose a few inhibitions, wise up a little—and coast along on his good looks, as usual. But actually the two events which were to change and complicate his life happened to him the year he spent there. He met a girl and he read a book. The girl, of course, was Patti Behrs, a European dancer in his drama class, who's now his wife. The book was Knock On Any Door. It made him want to be an actor for the first time in his young life.

That he got the chance is just one of those incredible things that happen sometimes in Hollywood. He quit Fox and tossed aside another easy meal ticket MGM offered him. He had his agent, who thought he was nuts, take him to Max Arnow's office at Columbia, and Max is as hard-cooked a casting director as you'll find anywhere. This kid had no experience, no credits, no anything as Hollywood ratings go. And all he wanted was the prize dramatic part in a big budget production—like that. And all he could say was, "I know that's for me. I'm the guy. . . I don't have to act. I know him. I'm pretty like he is but tough underneath. . ."

"Well," said Max tossing him a script. "I don't know. I don't think so. But, take this home."

"I don't have to. I can do it now."

"Take it home," said Max.

He took it home, but he didn't even study it. He already knew it. Next day he read it, the first time he had ever read aloud to anybody. And of course when he did, for Max and Bob Lord and Nick Ray and Humphrey Bogart, that was all there was to it. Bogie jabbed him in the ribs and winked an okay. His agent said, "If you want this boy you'd better talk fast. MGM's after him."

"Nobody's after me," said John Derek. "I'm after that part." So he got it and he did it and he was great.

It's an old Hollywood story. He was nobody and then suddenly he was the fair-haired boy. No one had ever heard of John Derek, then—boom—his name was on everybody's lips. Important people called him "pal," flattered him, told him he was the greatest young guy in the business. Twenty-two years old and suddenly the world was his oyster cocktail. It was all as strange and as deceptive as his new name, but he thought it was real, that he'd go right on from there—to the top. "I got the fat head," he'll tell you, a little bitterly, today. "I was sure the whole thing was a hundred per cent my doing. Actually, of course, it was a hundred per cent Nick Ray's. You know what I told myself? In three years, I said, I'll be on top of the heap, I'll be the biggest name in Hollywood. With that start—my first picture? How could I miss? Well—it's been three years and more. It's almost four—"

Let's see what's happened to John Derek in those four years—

He's had some surprises, not all pleasant ones. For one thing, the same people who found his handsome face exciting soon leveled off to outline it with knives.

There was the night when he walked into Christian's Hut down in Balboa, hungry from surfing and set for a curry dinner. A middle-aged movie producer at the bar spotted John as he passed. "Godalmity!" he bawled, "ain't he pretty!" John bit his lip and moved on to the juke box. The joker followed him over. "If I was as pretty as you, Baby, I'd own the world." He escaped to a table, but only briefly. The pest pursued him, leering. "Tell me, Kiddo—how does it feel to be so beautiful?" John got up and left. If the man had been younger he'd have socked him. But he wasn't hungry any more. He was sick. That's just a sample. It's happened right along.

Sometimes, though, he's had a chance to talk back. On the radio recently the sportscaster, Bill Stern, asked him stunningly, out of the blue. "How do you like your looks? How do you really feel?"

John paused a minute. It was unfair. "I like them," he came back truthfully. "I think they're good—I had good-looking parents. I'm proud of my looks and I like to think that underneath them I've developed the assets that make a man."

"I apologize for a vicious question," said Bill Stern. "You're all right and all man in my book, John."

Today if you drive far out in the San Fernando Valley, beyond Encino, up a curving drive to the top of a tree-studded knoll, you can see the good things that four years have given John Derek. And you can see John himself, as he is and really wants to be.

He'll be there, for sure, unless he's off on a trip or making a picture. In dungarees or jeans, always, and usually out on the three-acre place chopping cypress, sawing eucalyptus logs, building a wall or herding a tractor. It's his home, the kind he wants, out away from everything—including Hollywood—and he knows that the things there are his because he's making them with his own hands.

Inside the big Spanish style house will certainly be his pretty wife, Patti, and their two-year-old boy, Russell Andre. These are the real things in his life and John Derek knows he couldn't have had them if it hadn't been for Knock On Any Door, and the pictures he's made since.

John hasn't any wardrobe to speak of and neither has Patti. They haven't been to a night club since they were married. If they went to a formal affair tomorrow night (which they won't) he'd have to rent a tuxedo and she'd have to make over an old dress. None of the excitement and glamor of Hollywood enters their lives although both are young and certainly attractive. They never go to parties, seldom see friends. They're chronically broke. They can't afford to entertain. This is it—his home and his family—and it's what he likes. John Derek tells himself he should be completely happy—and sometimes he is. But sometimes, too, he's not. That's when he gets to thinking about himself and the life's work he was handed on a silver platter and then he says to himself, "The start was easy. But now the job's just beginning. The rough part is staying. And how do you do that?"

Right now there's nothing wrong with John Derek that one terrific picture couldn't cure—but that's the trouble. Although he's made six since Knock On Any Door, nothing he's done has satisfied him. "Whether it's an Englishman in green tights, an Italian in black tights or a Pole in a football suit," he reproaches himself, "it isn't me. So my first picture is my best picture—what do you think of that?" he'll say, really talking to himself. "What am I anyway—a morning glory?"

Brod Crawford is one who doesn't think so. "John," he told him the other day, after Scandal Sheet wound up, "you know I didn't used to like you. When you made All The King's Men with me I thought you were a swell-headed, selfish kid who needed a kick in the pants. But now," he grinned, sticking out his hand, "I want to say I like you, I like your work and I like to work with you, too."

From reports, Scandal Sheet is a pretty fair picture for John Derek. But meanwhile he suffers keenly from every jab at his ability—far more than he does from the cracks at his curls. A Hollywood columnist sized up a new script just the other day: "John Derek would be great for the part," he wrote—"if he could act." If he could act! How can you act unless you believe it? How can you ever be great again unless you go all out? Some seasoned stars wouldn't grant that a wrinkle. But with John it's so different.

He has read another book lately—and again he's fallen in love with it. It's the life of Joaquin Murietta, the California bandit of the Gold Rush days. If you mention it to Derek you're off for an hour or two's excited talk. He wanted to do it more than anything he's ever thought about. Why, Joaquin is himself—young, dark, dashing, intense, emotional or mixed up. He's pestered his Columbia bosses for months with ironclad arguments. He'd do it free. He'd make it himself in Mexico. He'd do anything. "Wel-l-l," they say, "we don't think so."

Sometimes he thinks they haven't looked inside the covers. So he takes the book around to their offices with gum stuck inside the pages. And it comes back—with the gum uncracked. He's getting the reputation for being off his trolley on the subject, but he doesn't care. "It's an obsession with me, sure," he says, "but I've got to play it. I've got to do something big, something great. I've got to make good like I said I would."

Last Christmas, John sent Charlie Feldman, his agent, a greeting card that he'd drawn himself. It showed a big, sparkling tree with an oversized, shining star at its peak. Leading up was a ladder, a tall, tall ladder with all the rungs broken and dangling. At the bottom was a tiny man, groping blindly. John Derek, of course.

"How do you get to the top of this thing?" he wrote.

Nobody can give John Derek the answer to that. He'll have to find out for himself. But one thing is certain: For him the climb will never be painless or smooth. He'll do it the hard way—all the way.

THE END

he's going that-a-way!

(Continued from page 55) was a wee tyke back here in Oklahoma City, horses and dogs were the great loves of his life. 'Someday, Mama,' he used to say, 'I'm going to own a slew of 'em.'"

Robertson owns a German shepherd, Chief, as well as a pointer named Radar recently given to him by his business manager, Morgan Maree.

"Tell you why I have a business manager," Dale explains. "When it comes to money I'm just not very interested. It seems to slip through my fingers.

"Take this money I'm making now. I couldn't rightly tell you if I have one cent in the bank. I don't drink. I don't go to nightclubs. I don't buy any clothes, but left to myself I couldn't save a penny.

"That's why I got me a business manager. I don't know how much I pay him, but he's sure worth it. He takes care of all the bills, all the taxes, all the expenses.

"He used to give me $35 a week for spending money, but the office figured it was too much, so now I'm down to ten bucks a week. They give my wife $25 a week for her pocket money. We seem to be making out okay. At least I got a 1951 Pontiac convertibile last year, and I think all the stuff we bought to furnish the house—it's modern furniture—has been paid for."

As you probably know, Dale Robertson mortgaged himself for $20,000 to get into pictures.

After the war he'd tried crashing Hollywood the hard way. He supported himself at odd jobs, and during his free time he begged for screen tests and interviews. Nothing happened.

"Then it came to me suddenly," he explains, "that trying to crash Hollywood was a full-time job. A man couldn't pull it off in between stints at filling stations. So I went back to Oklahoma City.

"I got my mother and my two aunts together, and I said, 'I believe I can make a success of it in Hollywood. Only I need a stake.'

" 'How much?' one of my aunts asked.

" 'About $20,000,' I said. 'That should keep me going for a few years. If I can't make it with that, I'll call it quits.' "

His aunts, Lillian and Ruth Queenan, thought it over. Dale was responsible to them for a lot. He was three years old when his father and his mother were divorced so he spent a good deal of his youth with them while his mother tried to make a living in the state banking department. Mrs. Robertson had two other sons to support in addition to Dale. There was Roxy, who is now private pilot for Bill Likins, one of the wealthiest oil men in the world, and there's Chester, a real estate man.

"Originally," Mrs. Robertson says, "I planned on having Roxy become a doctor, Chester a lawyer, and Dale a minister. Dale had a real fine voice as a youngster, still does, and he studied the violin for seven years. But he really hated it. Only reason he took violin was to please his aunts."

Ruth and Lillian Queenan were sure, even when Dale was four years old, that one day he'd end up on the stage. In fact, Will Rogers once saw the boy in Oklahoma and said, "Why don't you let me take him out to Hollywood and give him a screen test?"

But Dale's mother refused the offer. "Sure do appreciate it, Mr. Rogers," she said. "But Hollywood is no place for a four-year-old. He belongs here with his folks."

Dale's aunts thought so, too. They were also determined to make a gentleman out of their nephew, who was equally determined to grow up and become a cowboy. They bought him fancy dress clothes, artistic berets, long-flowing ties, black patent-leather shoes.

"When I stayed with my aunts," Dale recalls, "I wore all the fancy clothes. When I stayed with my mother, I wore my blue jeans. It was a question of indoor life versus outdoor life."

When Dale showed up in Oklahoma City in 1946 and asked them for a $20,000 stake, his aunts were convinced that the young man's cultural and artistic nature had triumphed over his love of the outdoors. They gave him the money and Dale headed for Hollywood.

"He was so homesick out there," his brother Roxy recalls, "that everytime he saw an Oklahoma license tag, he'd chase the car like a dog chasing a rabbit just so's he could tell the driver, 'I come from Oklahoma myself.' "

Homesick or not, Dale knew that he had to make a go of it in motion pictures. He had to satisfy his own ego and he couldn't fall down on the folks back home.

He sat down with his $20,000 and he figured out his plans. "I realized right from the start," he says, "that drawing-room dramatics weren't for me. I took a couple of night courses in motion picture production at the University of Southern California to get an idea of how the movie business worked.

"I also learned that if you want to get anywhere, especially if you're a newcomer, you'd better get yourself an agent."

Ordinarily, top-flight Hollywood agents shy away from newcomers who've had no dramatic training. Luckily for Dale, he was introduced by a producer to Ned Marin, who works for Charley Feldman's Famous Artists, Inc. Ned Marin took him out to MGM. "I'll show him to Billy Grady," Marin said, "he looks the Metro type."

Billy Grady, MGM's famous casting director, told Dale, "You have a good face. Let's see if we can find something for you."

That sounded great to Dale, but the months winged by, and he was still haunting the sound stages.

In the interim, however, he made friends with the studio secretaries and messenger boys. "These kids," he says, "would sneak scripts of forthcoming productions out to me. I'd read 'em, then call my agent and say, 'Hey, Ned, Paramount has a Western coming up and I think I'm right for such and such a role.' Ned would go around the next day and get me a reading.

"Lots of folks think the best way to crash Hollywood is to give parties for actresses and big shot producers. Not true. Much better to use the time for study and the money to live on.

"One office boy, I remember, worked for Nat Holt and slipped me a copy of Fighting Man Of The Plains, a movie Nat was planning.

"I read the script and there was a wonderful Jesse James role in it. I picked up the phone and called my agent. 'You've got to get me an interview,' I told him. He did, and it wasn't too hard, either. His brother was directing the picture.

"They asked me if I could ride and I said, 'Sure.' Then they asked me if I had any acting experience, and I said, 'None.' Then they said, 'Go ahead and read the part.' I'd read it before and I knew it pretty well. I got the job."

Studio boss Harry Warner's hobby is building and selling homes. Recently he erected a beautiful place at Malibu Beach and tried to interest writer Everett Freeman in buying it. "The beach air's bad for my sinus condition," Freeman said. "But I know you'll love this house, so I'll tell you what I'll do for you," Warner offered. "You pick out a lot anywhere in town and I'll have the house moved onto it, free of charge." Freeman considered the proposition a moment, then: "I'll be home all day Sunday. Why don't you drive the house by and let me look at it?"

Mickey Novak

When the picture came out, Dale got fairly good notices, and various studios began looking up their files on him.

Over at 20th they discovered that Dale had been tested three weeks before he got his first job in Fighting Man. The test was run again. It was horrible.

While 20th was wondering whether or not Dale was worth another test, Nat Holt put him in Caribou Trail.

Since audiences seemed to understand his Oklahoma drawl and like his sagebrush personality, Zanuck called Dale back. One more test, and he was signed to a seven-year contract.

That was on November 9th, 1949—a little more than three years after Dale had borrowed $20,000 from his aunts, and spent it.

In the two-and-a-half-years that have elapsed since he signed his contract, Dale has acted in Two Flags West, the only film he made in 1950, and Call Me Mister, Take Care Of My Little Girl, Golden Girl, Lydia Bailey, Return Of The Texan, Outcasts Of Poker Flat, all made in 1951.

And last year he was married, exactly 34 days after he met the girl. Her name was Jacqueline Wilson, and they met on April 15th at a dinner party hosted by producer Andre Hakim.

Five nights later, on their second date, he said to Jackie, "How about you and me getting married one of these days?"

Jackie smiled, and they were married on May 19th at her parents' home.

They spent a week-end at Santa Barbara then Dale had to return to the studio. They've yet to enjoy a honeymoon.

But Dale had two weeks off between the completion of The Outcasts Of Poker Flat and the start of The Full House, and since it was Christmastime he decided to take Jackie back to Oklahoma City and show her off.

Dale was so anxious to get home that he made the trip in 28 hours. "Coming back to Hollywood," he says. "I wasn't that anxious. Took me three days."

Among the 40 members of the clan who gathered to spend Christmas at the Robertsons was Dale's cousin, Fenny Wilson, who says:

"Hollywood may change most people, but it sure hasn't done anything to Dale. He looks the same, acts the same, talks the same, eats the same. When he was a little kid, he was wild about hot biscuits and grease gravy. He still is, also lemon pie."

His mother, Mrs. Varvel Robertson says, "About that lemon pie. Dale never could wait until I set the pie out on the table. He was always sticking his finger in. He did the very same thing at Christmastime. Matter of fact, he hasn't changed one bit, not only in little things but in outlook as well.

"To my boy, Hollywood is just the means to an end. He loves the outdoor life. That's what he wants more than anything else. People tell me that sooner or later acting gets into your blood, that it will get into Dale's blood. I don't know. Maybe it will. Right now it hasn't."

Dale says that this last Christmas at home was one of his best not only because he introduced his wife to the folks and she got along with them beautifully, but because it gave him an opportunity to spend some time with his brothers.

Three days after Dale arrived, his brothers showed up with three shot guns and a bird dog. That night the three Robertsons came home with their legal limit of quail.

A day later, Dale and his wife rode out to inspect the six fine saddle horses his mother owns on a farm 15 miles northwest of Oklahoma City. There was also much play with Captain and Chief, two German shepherds.

It is incredible how little of Hollywood has rubbed off on him. His best friends are people like his stand-in Kit Carson, his double Tom McDonough, and Kit's brother-in-law, Charley James. He keeps away from flashy personalities, and he keeps his head. "I'm not much as an actor" he drawls, "but maybe I can make a go of it. And by the time I wear on the public maybe I'll have enough put away to start my own production company.

"I want something working for me so that I can have a ranch and plenty of horses. I'd like to go fishing for maybe three months out of the year. I'd like to have three sons and a daughter. But I'll take what I get. I'd also like a ranch house with a lot of land. A man needs space and lots of air."

There is never any talk from Dale Robertson about plush Hollywood nightclubs or the latest stage hit in New York. Neither is he interested in local gossip or the publicity handouts which describe him as "the bobby-soxers' Western delight."

"He likes Hollywood very much," his mother says, "and he's set his mind on becoming a big success. But his thoughts will alway be in Oklahoma."

"On horses," Dale adds. THE END

who is monty kidding?

It is a very interesting situation, and makes for a very interesting character. The only trouble is that it is not true. None of it. And it is not, in the truest sense, a lot of manufactured hot air stormed up by press agents. It has a basis in fact—in the fact that Montgomery Clift looks poor and hungry and alone. He is really none of these things.

Clift lives like a spirited young millionaire plagued by notoriety and, while he avoids crowds, has a decided respect for the finer things in life, like good food, expensive clothes and swanky places to live.

The beginning of the legend of Montgomery Clift took place in the office of the late George Evans, a famous publicist who was responsible for the Sinatra panic some years back. It was shortly after Montgomery Clift had appeared in Red River. One of the employees in Evans' office was pasting clippings in a huge new album when a friend dropped by.

"Say," said the friend, "that's a mighty big press book. Got a new client?"

"Yeah," said the Evans man, "Garbo."

"Garbo!" said the friend. "I thought she was retired."

"Not this Garbo," said the press agent. "This one is just starting."

And he held up a shiny new picture of Montgomery Clift.

To anyone in the trade, the conversation was entirely understandable. It meant that the Evans office was about to launch a campaign for Monty's sake, based on the "I want to be alone" idea. And it worked.

During the first year of his stardom, which came very quickly after the release of Red River, Montgomery Clift rose to the heights on publicity which extolled his love of solitude and sack cloth. He had just the face for it, too—a long, lean profile stamped with quiet melancholy. His physique, thin and rather stooped, helped the picture.

It was necessary, in a campaign of this sort, to have the principal appear more than just regularly in the public prints. And, as a matter of fact, Clift appeared more regularly than any other actor of that day. During his first couple of years of fame, all the writers of stories on Monty claimed that they had finally smoked him out of his secret diggings to talk and pose. Monty was unearthed more times during that period than other actors who devote a good 50% of their time sitting on editors' doorsteps.

The real and the manufactured Montgomery Clift fit in together too neatly to label his public character a complete fraud. It just so happens that eternal public adulation does frighten and annoy him, and he avoids as much contact with the movie-going public as possible. He is not overly friendly, and he didn't make the friends he has easily.

His habits of residence, which have been called silly and unbecoming a celebrity have been made to appear as unique as a Yogi who lives on a bed of nails. Actually, Monty Clift lives in very fine apartments, but he moves often, and it can safely be assumed that he does so to avoid discovery by his fans.

The game of outwitting movie fans is a problem to Monty. Some time ago he noticed that a couple of teen-age girls always seemed to be down on the corner when he came home. The thought that they might be scouts for a pack came to him, so he decided to move again. However, the day after he changed his apartment he saw them again. There was nothing for it but to try and give them the slip. Consequently, he traveled like a

Too vital a matter for 'guess work' among young wives

(only two minutes' reading time may end all your confusion)

For a number of years there has been great confusion as to just what to use for internal feminine cleanliness. Women are certainly fully aware how necessary internal hygiene is to their health and married happiness. They realize how important it is to douche after their periods and to guard against offensive odor. But WHAT to use has long been the bewildering question.

In the past, many women were forced to use harmful poisons. Then next, women foolishly went to the other extreme and used weak, ineffective home-made solutions. Imagine any up-to-date fastidious woman taking such chances with the most intimate concern of her life! But fortunately the advent of ZONITE has put an end to all this confusion.

Developed By Famous Surgeon and Scientist

The ZONITE principle—developed by a renowned surgeon and scientist—was the first in the whole world to be powerfully effective yet absolutely safe to tissues. Scientists have tested every known antiseptic-germicide they could find on sale for the douche and no other type proved so powerful yet harmless as ZONITE. It is positively non-poisonous, non-irritating. ZONITE can be used as directed as often as needed without the slightest risk of injury. And it does the job!

What ZONITE does . . .

ZONITE gives you BOTH internal and external hygienic protection. It keeps your person so dainty and clean. ZONITE helps guard against infection and kills every germ it touches. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, but you can depend on ZONITE to kill every reachable germ. An ideal solution for effective feminine cleanliness. Inexpensive, too!

A lucky day for me

...when I discovered Tampax

Do you spend those "certain days" every month worrying about other people—hoping they won't notice your discomfort and general uneasiness during that period? . . . Next time why not switch to doctor-invented internally-worn Tampax—so simple, so small that you do not even feel it when in place. And final disposal becomes no problem.

No pins or belts are needed with Tampax. No pulling, binding, twisting or chafing. And best of all, no odor. Tampax is composed of pure surgical cotton conveniently fitted into slender one-time-use applicators, making insertion so easy and dainty that your hands need never touch the Tampax. Other features: with Tampax there are no bulges or wrinkles to "show" through clothing. And you need not remove it during your tub or shower, nor while swimming.

NO BELTS
NO PINS
NO PADS
NO ODOR

Tampax brings greater peace of mind to the wearer. Join the millions of women now using it. Sold at drug and notion counters in three absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. Month's supply goes into your purse. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

tailed crook for a week or more, changing cabs, walking through buildings and using all sorts of devices to give his juvenile shadows the slip long enough for him to duck into his apartment house.

Although the kids weren't Sam Spades they showed a remarkable talent for the game, because after a few days of fruitless tailing they apparently came to the conclusion that they were being had in the traffic, and turned to the apartment house itself as the best hunting ground.

Naturally, in view of the situation, Monty didn't have his name on the mail box, but the kids deduced that he went in there with his belongings and was undoubtedly still there. They got themselves a handful of magazine subscriptions and began canvassing the building. When they knocked on Monty's door it just happened that a young lady who was his dinner guest opened it. The girls tried the magazine bit for a few minutes, then one of them came right out and said, "Doesn't Montgomery Clift live in this apartment?"

The girl who answered the door was quick. "I wish he did!" she said.

But the "detectives" didn't give up. Every afternoon they came to the building with a new gimmick—anything to give them an excuse to knock on all the doors and maybe peer in. It finally got so that every time a knock came on the door, Monty, if he was alone, would dash for cover, and if someone was with him, he'd make like a mouse until the girls had gone. Finally he couldn't stand it any longer.

Groucho Marx was sitting alone in a booth at Chasen's when a well-known actor walked over to him and said, "Groucho, won't you join me?" "No thanks," said Groucho. "And don't YOU join me!"

Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

He was sitting with his date one night when the knock came again.

"Okay," said Monty. "Let them in."

The kids were admitted, victory shining all over their faces. Monty sat them down and had a nice talk with them. He explained that whenever the autograph collectors found out where he lived they came night and day until the other tenants complained and the manager asked him to move. He told them he liked the apartment he had now and begged the kids to keep his address a secret. The agreement was sealed with a hand shake and cokes all around——and after an hour or so the visitors left.

That was a coup in a sense for Monty because the girls never did tell and he wasn't discovered, but he never quite understood the reason why they stole two expensive silver ash trays from his living room coffee table.

The usual date with Montgomery Clift, according to the legend, is like something that could be expected from a gangster hiding out from the law. Slip into a dimly-lit street after dark, look to right and left, slink down the back alley ways to a crummy saloon or cafe where a whispered conversation could be held in a dark booth. This no doubt came into being when it was disclosed that Monty didn't lunch at "21" every day or dine at the Stork Club every night.

Actually, Montgomery Clift would rather not eat than dine in a hash house. It is true that he does most of his chomping on the East Side of New York, but you will find that most of the better eating places in Manhattan are in that district. The prices aren't as high as the celebrity hang outs, but the grub, according to gourmets, is much better. And the wine cellars of some of the smaller Lexington and Third Avenue bistros are the best in the land.

In the matter of food, Montgomery Clift is quite the opposite to the fellow pictured as prefering hot dog joints. He likes his meals prepared by experts, and will not settle for a medium steak if he orders it rare. And he's no hair tonic drinker, either. He wants his liquor from a bottle with the best label.

Wherever Montgomery lives, you can bet that comfort lives there with him. He's a man who likes soft sheets and tender pillows and fluffy blankets. He's the kind of a fellow who would bang on the pipes all night if the heat went off, and if there wasn't enough hot water for a lot of showering and shaving he'd cancel his lease in a minute.

As for clothes, Monty, like a good many young American men these days, leans toward the casual grace found in good conservative clothing houses. The object of these clothes is to make a man look casually groomed and comfortable. It is also true that disciples of this sort of attire appear to have only one suit. Actually, and it is true of Monty, the clothes closet is well packed with tweeds and flannels. Take a look at his shoes. They're the best.

It will probably come as a surprise to many, but Monty is considered one of the best customers at the Maisonette Room of the St. Regis Hotel. And this is as swank as boites can be. The waiters in the room say that Monty, instead of acting like a fish out of water, has all the finesse of a rich roué in his deportment, and can slip a head waiter a large bill as quietly as a Vanderbilt. It must be said that during his most steady patronage of the room he was escorting Liz Taylor, who likes the place, but Monty liked it, too.

If, as the writers say, Montgomery Clift is at heart a Greenwich Village Bohemian, why, then, doesn't he take up residence in the Village and grow a beard and sleep on lumps of Kapok. He doesn't like that sort of life. If, as the writers say, he doesn't care much about pictures, why doesn't he get out of them. That is very easy. Instead, he has, from the first, surrounded himself by the cleverest brains in the business. All who have done business with him reckon his lawyer to be as sharp as they come. His agents, MCA, are counted the best in the movie business. His press agents have always been the cleverest, as is his mentor, Leland Hayward. Montgomery Clift has one passion he wants to satisfy to the limit. It has been written about, but it is not a fake. He wants to travel and see the world. He wants to fill his bank with enough green stuff to keep him happy in the far away places when he quits—and to do a good bit of wandering before he quits.

To suit that purpose he will come to Hollywood whenever the script, director, co-star and money are right. He will stick to the Garbo gimmick as long as it pays off and keeps him a head or so above the movie players who live the regimented lives. If it backfires on him, he'll change the gimmick, but he wants to be a star.

During one of his talks with a famous Hollywood writer a couple of years ago, Monty got through the routine confessions and, denying he was odd, gave 30 or 40 instances proving he was. It was a stock interview and maybe the writer didn't expect to get anything true out of it. But Monty let one line drop that gave the whole show away. Nobody, not even the writer, got the full meaning.

"How about money?" he asked. "They tell me you don't care about money."

"Oh, but I do," said Monty, looking away off into the future. "I like money very much. It gives a guy wings!" THE END

I live with prayer

(Continued from page 64) church also tells me that I must understand my mother, and I know that to her, who was brought up very strictly in Italy, my words are so far just talk.

Not knowing even the language of the strange country in which she finds herself, and with the responsibility of three daughters falling on her, her very love for us keeps her from accepting easily patterns of conduct which seem completely unreliable. If I did not know this to be true I would rebel. But since I do know it, how can I depart from the custom which gives her so much security?

So this is my big job now—to convince my mother that in America, where girls have more independence, I, too, can be trusted with such freedom. And the feeling that I will be successful . . . this, too, comes from my faith.

The church means much to me. It seems that I found it almost without any help from others. In Italy we are most of us Catholics, but my father was not a churchgoer nor did my mother go often. They did not oppose, they did not urge. I had to come to it, as I did, by myself.

When, as a small girl, I first started to think of people and the world, I decided that humans had two sides . . . their inside and their outside. Things could happen to your outside but they were not important unless you felt them inside. To be complimented or scolded or get a present—that was important because you felt it inside. But to get your face washed or eat your dinner—that was just outside stuff and meant nothing. (Food was puzzling and a sort of disappointment. You had a great want for it inside but as soon as you got it nothing much happened—you just didn't seem to want it any more.)

When I was seven years old I went to a Mass at which, strangely enough, the officiating priest was not only my father's uncle (he had brought up my father from the age of six months, even more strangely!) but he also lived with us. I was tremendously proud as I watched him at the altar and, as a child will, wanted to tell everyone around me who he was. Then I began to get interested in the service itself. I didn't understand it but I did begin to feel it, glowing and wonderful . . . the greatest "inside" feeling I had ever had. It was like being sung to . . . and I knew then for the first time that I had a soul . . . and I knew to Whom it was committed.

IT MAY seem funny but that which I learned as a child, not only my love for God, but that people have two sides, is still something I believe in, and to me only inside happiness counts. Just the other day Andrew Marton, the director of my present picture, The Devil Makes Three, was talking about dialogue and said the same thing in different words.

"If you don't feel a line there is no use speaking it, and if you do feel it you don't even have to speak it to convey the idea," he said.

It made me think of my father. Even though he did not go to church I could feel his quick disapproval if I was late for an early Mass on a Sunday. He didn't have to say anything, it was just there in his manner. And I know it was so because sometimes I would reply just as if he had spoken. I would say, "All right, I will be sure to go at noon." And instantly I would know that his anger was gone.

All during the terrible war years when the Germans had possession of our country there was no comfort to be had anywhere but inside of you. If you talked to people they would say there was no hope. If you listened to news reports they were almost always bad ones. Every development, every happening, was discouraging. And so we who were there had nothing left but our hearts and what was in them. This is why I cling so strongly to my faith. It was not only a religion, it was a friend to me, and I did not pray so much, it seemed to me, as I talked to this friend when I was in need.

This habit of talking—or praying—has entered my life never to leave it. There have been times when my prayers were not directly answered . . . but always, the praying brought me such peace of mind that my difficulties, whatever their nature, suddenly became supportable.

If someone asked, "What has been the greatest help to you as an actress?" I would have to answer, "Prayer." The reason is very simple. Without prayer I wouldn't have been able to speak even the first word of the first line I ever had in a picture. I remember when this first picture, Tomorrow Is Too Late, was made in Italy, I was just overcome by the thought of going before the camera.

"I will not be able to do it," I told myself. "I will stand there and forget everything. They will look at me and say, 'We have made a mistake with this Pier Angeli girl. Get her out of there.'"

And then I remembered that around the corner from the studio was a little church (as there is a little church around every corner in Rome) and I ran to it as fast as I could. When I came back I felt as I always feel after prayer—serene.

There were, I think, 229 separate scenes in Tomorrow Is Too Late. That's very nearly how many times I ran into the little church!

I can remember how as a youngster I prayed for such odd blessings. I wanted a little girl of my own to mother, mastery of Latin in which I was very poor, and even a banana! (I had not seen one for years.)

I love children and when I was about 12 or 13 it seemed to me that I simply must have a little girl over whom I could fuss. I prayed for one constantly, and one day my mother, who had not had children since my twin sister, Maria Luisa, and I were born, gave birth to a baby girl. After such a time lapse it was the surprise of the community, and since my feelings and what I had done about it were very well known I was told to be very careful thereafter about what I was praying for!

My Latin never improved, but on the other hand, when the day came for me to learn English for films I picked it up without much trouble at all. It is not good English, I know, but it is far better as English than my Latin was as Latin.

As for the banana . . . my craving came for it during the war when nothing like that was obtainable except at those stores where food prices were so high that only profiteers could afford to buy. Yet one afternoon my father came home with a package and out of it he took just one banana—not one of the big bananas you have here but a small, African-grown type. As long as I live I will never forget this delightful surprise.

Maria Luisa and I didn't eat it with bites. Oh, never! We broke it in half and licked at our portions just like you do an ice cream cone. Mine must have lasted at least two hours.

DESPITE the fact that it was not safe to be on the streets during the war, especially towards the end when the Germans knew they were losing and got desperate, my father wanted my sister Maria Luisa and me to keep on with our school. "We must not be frightened into living in holes like animals," he said. "We must be as normal as we can. I must work if I can and you girls must learn if you can."

At the same time father, who was an architect, would also go to work every day, though for him it was quite risky. Men who knew anything about construction were useful to the authorities and found themselves being separated from their families and sent to far-away places. This no one wanted—your chances of coming back were just a gamble. So every day my father would disappear into a building where the front door was marked "Closed," in order to keep soldiers from investigating. And he would not come out until it was time to start for home at night.

One afternoon, when I was not yet 13, I was coming home alone (school was nearly a mile's walk from home) because my sister had not gone to classes that day. Suddenly I saw a German soldier with a sub-machine gun looking at me from across the street. He was not staggering, yet I knew somehow by the expression on his face that he had been drinking. The next second my heart almost stopped for he called out and started to walk towards me. For an instant I stopped—then I went flying. I didn't have to look back to know that he was running after me—his voice lifted up in an enraged "Halten!" and his heavy army shoes pounding the pavement in pursuit.

I was so young that I had only one idea—he wanted to kill me, and I kept thinking that any moment bullets would tear through me. Not so long before this I had actually seen a civilian shot in the shoulder, and then shot again, this time to death, when he got up on his feet and spit into the face of his attacker.

In desperation I ran into an apartment house and flew up the stairs praying that I would find help. I was just reaching the third floor when a door opened and a man beckoned to me to enter. Without stopping I ran in and he closed the door. When he turned around I was so faint I would have fallen if he hadn't caught me. He put me on a chair and after a moment I started to whisper what had happened, but he motioned to me that it was not necessary to explain. I still felt terribly frightened and then I felt frightened for him as well. He could get in great trouble for helping me if he were caught. I told him this and started to get up, but he told me just to keep quiet and not worry.

"If we Italians did not help each other then we would be worse than the Germans here," he said.

We heard the soldier clumping up the stairs and my heart threatened to fly apart with each sound, but the man remained calm and gestured to me to drink my brandy. Apparently the soldier had not seen where I had entered because after a while he went downstairs again. But when the man went out to look the soldier was still downstairs, leaning against the wall as if determined to stay till I came out.

We waited for more than an hour for him to leave and during this time the man wanted to know if I cared to telephone my family to keep them from worrying about me. But I thought this would be unwise. My mother would get word to my father and I knew he would come running for me only to get into a fight with the soldier. It was almost dark when it at last seemed safe to go, and the man walked with me all the way to our house.

"I don't know who you are," I told the man, "but you came out of my prayer."

He looked at me with his face straight but his eyes widening as if he were thinking about my words. "What a wonderful thanks you have given me," he said. "Now I am grateful to you."

I THINK the happiest day of my life was my First Communion which, because of the disruption of war, I did not receive until I was nearly 15. For months my mother searched through Rome for white material for my dress and finally came home one day with some beautiful organdy. My saddest day was to occur not many years later and after I knew I was coming to America for a movie career. Two weeks before I was due to leave with my mother and two sisters, my father died suddenly from a heart attack. We had been so close to each other that I practically collapsed. Nothing in the outside world could comfort me. But from the other world, and, I am convinced, only because I had always kept myself close to it, came the solace and strength to lift me from my grief.

Now we are here to start a new life. I have been through too much to let little things bother me. My mother is making a nice home. This, too, is part of her early training because in Italy much attention is paid to the home to keep it attractive and happy so that the girls in the family will not be too anxious to go out, not too anxious to make a quick marriage.

When boys first asked me to go out in Hollywood my answer used to be, "May I bring my mother, too?" I had only to notice the funny look in their faces to know that I was saying the wrong thing. Now I simply do not accept unless they already know that someone else must be along.

But, as I say, I am not too worried. I have faith that everything will come out all right . . . even that my mother will some day soon let me go out like other girls. And for that I need lots and lots of faith!

See Jane Wyman on the street. She is five-feet-seven, with the figure of a fashion model—curvy, yet slender; slim, but stacked. Her carriage is almost regal and she stands and walks with her head up, chin in and chest out—as though she's glad about her figure. Her dark hair is modishly styled and sprinkled liberally with grey. She has the face of an imp, pert, small-nosed—and her mouth is full and pouty, like a calendar girl. Her eyes are soft brown and moist. And from the usual expression on her face, you might expect her to shout "Hurray!" at any moment.

That's physically. In personality, Jane Wyman is even more distant from the screen roles she portrays. In Johnny Belinda she was a mute. In person she'll talk an arm off a chatterbox and never let him get a word in. In The Glass Menagerie she was a demure little mouse. In person she's a ball of fire, a squirmer, a leaper-out-of-chairs, an arm waver. She's almost dangerous to be around.

The little old lady in The Blue Veil was a quiet, gentle spinster. In person, Jane Wyman has the courage of a homicide cop and wherever she doesn't fit she'll squeeze in. Some time back, when her home was robbed, Jane walked into the house and knew the burglars were still there. But instead of running screaming down the street to a neighbor's for help, she marched right up to her bedroom, shut the door, and, in a very loud voice, called the police—and then sat fuming on the edge of the bed till they came, while the robbers scrambled from the premises in terror.

A couple of days later when a character came to her front door, told her that he knew who had her jewels and offered to take her to the crooks, she stood in the doorway for 20 minutes and talked to the guy—and darn near wound up going along with him. Even the tough cops turned pale when she told them.

WITHIN Jane Wyman, it must be admitted, there are some of the traits of most of the characters she plays. But, in the main, she is another kid altogether. Take, for instance, Jane Wyman and Love.

Let's start from scratch. Today. Nobody is more weary of the sad tales that even today are still creeping up in the magazines and newspapers depicting her squatting in the wreckage of a smashed marriage, massaging a crippled heart and weeping for justice and understanding than Jane is herself. The stories are generally illustrated with a photo of Jane in one of her more dejected screen poses—one that would make a rent collector cry. Jane cringes when she sees them.

"Why," she moans, "do they do this to me? Why don't they use a picture with a smile!"

There is one thing you can be certain about. Jane Wyman, now, in 1952, is a happy, well-adjusted, beautiful divorcee. She loves her children, likes and gets along famously with their dad and, aside from a normal remorse that things didn't last, has no unhappy thoughts about her marriage.

And she's normally interested in love.

When an appointment was made for an interview with a MODERN SCREEN reporter, her publicity agent took a dim view of any possible discussion of romance.

"I don't think she'll talk at all about anything like that," he said.

The reporter decided to try anyway. Seated in a comfortable office in the elegant MCA office in Beverly Hills, the talk had been chummy and chatty.

"Somebody told me," the reporter said, "that you don't want to talk about love."

"That is not true," Jane said. "I always want to talk about love. Let's talk about it all afternoon. I love love. I think it's the greatest thing in the world. But it's got to be Love—not a passing fancy."

"That sounds fair," the reporter said.

"I have never objected to talking to the press about my personal feelings for anyone," Jane continued seriously. "But I have objected when a columnist or a writer puts words in my mouth or emotions in my heart. At the time of my divorce I used to read the trash written about how I felt or Ronnie felt and I just couldn't believe it. We were grown up people with a serious problem and we were painted as a couple of moony adolescents with absolutely no sense of responsibility."

Jane got to her feet and walked around the room for a moment or two.

"And during all that time," she continued, "nobody ever called me up and asked me for the facts. They just came to conclusions and printed them."

Standing there defending a principle, Jane Wyman looked as full of vinegar as a high school student. After 17 years in the movies she didn't look a day older than she had when she first signed a contract with Warner Brothers to play giddy flappers in that studio's early musicals. True, the bottle-blonde hair was gone, back to its natural dark brown and the grey was there, but it looked like something she was trying out. There wasn't a wrinkle in her face or a bulge in her figure.

"What about the men your name has been linked with?" she was asked.

"What men?" Jane asked. "Do I go out with more men than the average girl?"

"No," we agreed, "but there have been a few. You've been rumored on the verge of marrying a couple of them."

"That's what I mean," Jane said. "I've been rumored on the verge of marrying. Why rumored? Look, if I ever decide I'm going to marry a man there will be no need for rumors. I'll call up everybody I know and tell them about it. I'll take ads. I'll hire somebody to tell about it while I'm asleep."

Jane sat down and got very serious. She wanted to be well understood.

"I think it is a mistake," she said, "for actresses to have their names linked with every man they go out with. Supposing I'm introduced to a man and I find him interesting—for any of a number of reasons. Like maybe he has a nice voice, or he talks well, or he is an authority on something I'm interested in. We would like to get together again. What do we do, arrange to wear disguises and meet behind a sign board? No, we go to dinner or a night club. The photographers come by and snap our pictures. A columnist sees us. The next day it states in the papers we are engaged, and when the magazine comes out a couple of months later, there is a picture of me and the guy with a caption reading we're the current hottest romance. By that time the poor fellow is probably back home in Cleveland or someplace and maybe married. That's kind of silly."

Jane had to get up and get a drink of water. She moved about the office like a show girl leaving for work.

"And think about how it scares the fellow," she said abruptly. "Maybe I like him and I kind of force him into a date—some girls do that, you know. And maybe he just doesn't care too much for my type. When he sees that guff in the papers he's sore—and I'm too embarrassed to see him again. There aren't too many good fellows around these days, honey, and why scare them off?"

"You don't believe, then," the reporter said, "in writers printing hints of romance, or possible romance."

"Of course I don't," Jane said. "Lincoln didn't believe in people printing exaggerated stories about his death, either. I think the word love is abused too much by people writing about movie stars. If I were in love with a fellow and he wasn't in love with me I'd never let on. Or if a man was in love with me, and I wasn't with him, the same thing. It is only real when two people are in love together. And, I repeat, when and if that happens to Wyman, you lads will need a lot of new pencils to take down my quotes."

The reporter tried to remember back to see if there ever had been an indication that Jane was seriously interested in any of the men she had gone out with since her divorce.

There was Greg Bautzer. Bautzer, a busy Hollywood lawyer by day, is a butterfly by night. There wasn't an instance in which Jane had even hinted that she was smitten with the handsome Greg—even though it has been printed many times that they were due to tie the marital knot at any moment.

And there had been Lew Ayres. Lew was the first man Jane had dated after her separation from Ronnie Reagan. There were some bold columnists who said that Jane had left Ronnie because she was in love with Ayres, but, thinking back, time had proven that wrong. Once or twice, Jane had denied romance with Ayres and then had just dummied up. She had just finished making Johnny Belinda with Lew and it appeared, in retrospect, that the association had been one of friendship based on a close contact of the moment.

A Hollywood producer suggested to his secretary that she accompany him on a weekend trip to Palm Springs. "Listen," she snapped, "I may be your typewriter, but I'm not portable!"

Irving Hoffman in The Hollywood Reporter

And then there was Manny Sacks, Frank Sinatra's pal and head of RCA records. Jane, while in New York, spent almost all of her free evenings with Sacks and they had been photographed together in most of the swank cafes. She had said, for a couple of columnists, that their relationship was platonic and business. Nobody believed her, so once again she stopped talking about it. The fact that she is now selling phonograph records as a singer sort of proves she was telling the truth.

And then there was the endless talk that Jane would remarry Ronnie. With two children they both love it would be next to impossible for them to stay entirely away from one another, and they have common business interests after ten years of marriage, so dinners and such were inevitable. Whenever the gossip about a reconciliation started. Jane would promptly deny it—once—and then drop the matter and let the reporters write what they pleased.

Yes, it can be truthfully said that Jane Wyman has had more than her fill of rumors about love and romance and she could hardly be blamed for being a little bitter about it and very determined to have no part in future gossiping on those subjects. However, the one thing the writers failed to take into consideration is that Jane really is entirely unlike her screen personality in all respects—and that she wasn't and never has been lonely and pressing for a romance, but just quietly biding her time like any beautiful woman who would rather not live alone.

This reporter tried to double check that angle.

"But wouldn't you like to fall in love?"

"Of course I would," Jane said with a twinkle in her eye. "I'm nuts about the idea. The trouble is, truly, though, that I haven't had much time to expose myself to the bug. For the past four years I have been so busy that I have been doing little else but work and sleep. I go to bed right after dinner and get up at six for an early call—and there aren't many suitors around at that hour. When I work I like to concentrate on what I'm doing, so I spend most of my time between shots in my dressing room learning my lines."

"And how long can this keep up?" she was asked.

"It's just about over," Jane said, laughing and jumping up on the arm of her chair. "When I finish The Will Rogers Story at Warner Brothers, sometime early in May, I'm going to buy four or five feet of train, boat and plane tickets and little Janie Wyman is going on a fling."

"Like to where?" we asked.

"Like to Paris," she said. "Like to London, the Riviera, Rome and all points east and west. I have never been abroad for fun. This time that's all I'm going to think about. I'm going to go to England and pick up a couple of chums and I'm going to take them with me and the first one who mentions work gets sent back home in disgrace."

"Is there some man you're thinking about over there?" the reporter asked.

"No," said Jane, "but who knows what will happen? It will be spring. No early calls and lots of time to meet people and get to know them. I'm not looking for romance—but I'm not knocking it."

And if there is romance abroad, or in New York, or right next door, Jane Wyman, given the time to seek it out, will find it. She is riper for love than she thinks, and when she is free from the influence of the drabs she plays in Hollywood movies she might find it easier to locate. There is one thing in her favor, too. She can soften the toughest people.

During the shooting of Here Comes The Groom, which she made with Bing Crosby, she even broke down the barrier that surrounds the famous crooner.

During the first couple of weeks of shooting, Bing was polite and considerate, but, as is usual with him, he had little to do with his fellow players. Every afternoon at four, Bing would stop work and go to his dressing room and have a cup of tea, as a pick up. Jane would take advantage of the break and have tea served in her dressing room. It was a ritual that never changed.

One day, though, just a week or so before the picture was finished, Bing called his usual halt.

"Tea time," he said.

Jane left the set and started toward her dressing room.

"Hey," Bing called. "Just a minute. Where are you going?"

"To my dressing room," Jane said, "for tea."

"Nonsense," Bing said. "Follow me, girl, I'm pouring."

And he did. And there is a legend that anyone who can soften Crosby up can get a date with the Statue of Liberty. Jane Wyman may do all right this spring.

If her face is her fortune—it is also her problem. Hedy's beauty is a living, vital, separate thing to her and to thousands of her fans. Her sheer loveliness has won homage from men the world over—and women have envied her and tried to look like her.

So, is it any wonder that the glamorous Lamarr might easily have developed what the psychiatrists call a Narcissus complex (Narcissus saw his face reflected in a clear pool and promptly fell in love with his own image).

Several men who have been hopelessly (and I mean hopelessly) in love with Hedy have told me that she is in love with them only in the thrilling, rhapsodic early stages of the romance—the flower-sending stage, the ardent courting stage, the first exhilarating chapters when they are literally at her feet, swooning over her.

When the adoring, incense-burning male suddenly becomes a husband or a less ardent suitor, the practical side of love—such as trying to live together happily—is nigh on to impossible. It is one thing to be rapturously "in love" and another to love when there are children's noses to be wiped, groceries to be bought and income taxes to be paid.

Now the rumors are prevalent that Hedy and her fifth husband, Ted Stauffer, are on the verge of separating because "his business keeps him in Mexico"—and hers in Hollywood—I wonder if Hedy's fabulous beauty has been a blessing or a drawback to her personal happiness?

But women are not the only sufferers from love problems—not by a close-up; King (Clark) Gable himself is in self-imposed exile from his kingdom because of the bitterness he feels about his divorce from the former Lady Sylvia Ashley.

As much as he has been adored by feminine followers and deeply loved by many women in his life, Clark has found complete happiness with only one woman, Carole Lombard.

It is commonly believed that her image, permanent in his heart, is the reason he has not found happiness since her death.

And I believe that that is largely true. It was when Sylvia began changing and redecorating the house where Clark had lived so happily with Carole that their love troubles began.

But, what a great many people do not know is that Carole was a business partner, going 50-50 with Clark on all investments and expenses, as well as his perfect love-mate.

That was one marriage in which there was no problem of money because they went along together on everything. This was also true of Clark's second marriage—to Rhea Langham.

So, when Sylvia started spending money like water, it was a new matrimonial experience for The King. One of the few comments he has permitted himself about their separation was, "She spent money faster than I could make it." And, he has told intimates that he will leave the country before he pays Sylvia the enormous amount she is asking. He says that she has a fortune of her own (Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., left her a lot of money). And Clark will fight to the bitter finish any demands her lawyers make for a big financial settlement.

Gary Cooper's love problem is an ancient one! Poor, bewildered, unhappy Coop, one of the most likeable men in the world, is battling the heartache of being in love with two women at the same time. Or let me put it another way: he deeply misses the wonderful home life he shared with Rocky for nearly 18 years and with their daughter Maria. And he is in love with beautiful, serene Patricia Neal.

As I write this—Coop has neither woman. He has been seriously ill and I agree with Pat that much of his illness has been brought on by his inner turmoil, regret over his broken home and the separation from his adored daughter Maria that it entails, conflicting with the love he sincerely feels for Pat.

The fact that Gary's predicament is not novel and many men have faced similar crises, doesn't make the pain any less acute for him.

He told me soon after he separated from Rocky, "We are no longer happy together. But a man can't live with a woman for 18 years and know the happiness of being a father and husband so long—without feeling a terrific sense of loss."

And he said to me about Pat, "I love her and she loves me. But this is not the solution to everything!"

Obviously not—for several weeks ago, Pat told Coop she is stepping out of his life forever—or until he can decide in his own heart, which love is the strongest.

Among the younger men, Farley Granger seems to me to be having one of the most serious problems to solve. I think "Farl" was at one time very much in love with Shelley Winters. And he has had other romantic flutterings.

But, first, Farley feels he must make his way as an artist and a successful star. He cannot fall wholly in love—and leave the world well lost for the consequences—because his own future is so much in his thoughts.

Farley isn't out for big money, either. More than anything else he wants to be recognized as a serious artist, an actor who has made an artistic as well as financial success of his career.

This introspection does not make him the ideal suitor even for a girl like Shelley Winters who is, herself, a most ambitious gal. Which brings us to the love life of our girl "Shell."

At this writing she is in Rome to bring back the person and affection of one Vittorio Gassman who, Shelley declares to high heaven, is the love of her life. She has known him, I should say, about three months. But, already she is at work planning his divorce from his Italian wife, so that she can get him as fast as possible to Las Vegas. Then, says she, they will marry.

I say this will take a bit of doing, over and above Shelley's madly expressed passion for the gent. In the first place, he is not a citizen. In the second place, he told his friends in Rome that he and Shelley were just good friends and that he had no intention of asking for a divorce.

Certainly, this situation was clear to Miss Winters who is far from a dumbbell. But Shelley has a little way of falling in love where it will get the best and biggest headlines. Only a lady not allergic to publicity would have toured Europe with one man (Farley) and come home "engaged" to another—and a married man, at that. (Since this they have both announced that they'll wed.)

Shelley, like Farley, has a hell-bent determination to be a successful star and an exciting one. At the present stage of her career, I believe she is far more interested in love affairs which will attract plenty of newspaper space than in really falling in love and settling down to an inconspicuous married life. Although, of course, I may be wrong.

ODD as it may seem, I believe that just the opposite is true of another blonde beauty, Lana Turner. Lana's real love trouble is that she can't find a man who wants her for herself alone—and not for her glamorous reputation as a fascinating screen star.

I know Lana, and I say she would gladly give up her career if she could find the right man to share her life. She can't—and perhaps she never will find this paragon of pure love who will cherish her above her glowing success.

Lana did everything in her power to hold her marriage to Bob Topping together, even to saying she would not re-sign a contract with MGM if he wanted her to be free to travel and be just Mrs. Topping. There was a time when she would have given up her career for Tyrone Power. She would give it up for any man she sincerely loves.

But her love problem is finding this man who will and can love as deeply as Lana—when she falls in love!

There are other "problem lovers" in Hollywood who, like these examples I have named for you, have troubles in working out their emotional happiness. Your own problem may be like one of theirs—or something entirely different. Some of these heart troubles will be solved—and some won't.

But the wisemen of the ages have agreed that the best recipe for love is—to love, to put the happiness of the loved one before your own. Unselfish love can be and has been unrequited—but it is never shallow or empty and, as Ralph Waldo Emerson put it, "never wasted."

BEND OF THE RIVER

Bend Of The River takes us along with a band of hardy pioneers going to settle in the wilds of Oregon some hundred years ago. These settlers, led by Jimmy Stewart, ride in covered wagons, paddle boats up the river, meet and lick Indians, and generally have more lusty, rip-roaring experiences than you'll find in our tired aspirin age. Altogether Bend Of The River has more than a giant-size portion of shootin' and fightin' and hollerin'. Stewart has to whip many shifty characters along the way to Oregon and all the while he has to keep his sharpest eye on Arthur Kennedy, who may be perfectly good but then again may be perfectly bad. Throughout the journey most of the suspense comes from this question: is this fellow Kennedy on our side or against us? Both Stewart and Kennedy play their parts so laconically that their very calm makes you feel you're surely on top of a powder keg. You'll have to find out about Kennedy for yourself—we won't tell you—and while you're finding out, you'll get a boot out of the fighting, the natural handsomeness of Oregon and finally the peaceful life the settlers win after much hardship. Julia Adams is one of the pioneers in Bend Of The River and she's a very special reason why we'd have liked to have been an Oregon settler, too.

Cast: James Stewart, Arthur Kennedy, Julia Adams, Rock Hudson.—U.-I.

VIVA ZAPATA!

Marlon Brando made sparks fly in A Streetcar Named Desire. In Viva Zapata! he sets the screen ablaze. His characterization of an illiterate Mexican peasant who fights boldly for a better life for the people has the fire and grandeur of profound acting. Written by John Steinbeck, Viva Zapata! is a poetic and majestic look into the Mexico of some 50 years ago. Brando, as Zapata, one of the titans of Mexican history, is young, uneducated and dedicated. He becomes loved among the peasants but so feared among politicians that the Mexican Army goes after him, catching him in an ambush and shooting at him mercilessly until he is dead. This story of Zapata's life has been directed by Elia Kazan with a proper sense of tragedy, but also with an appreciation of the fun and vitality in Zapata's nature. It is rare and funny and significant to see this peasant youth love a girl, marry her, and on their wedding night, make her give him his first lesson in reading.

Cast: Marlon Brando, Jean Peters, Anthony Quinn.—20th Century-Fox.

the beautiful brain trust

(Continued from page 61) hidden talents even eluded Jeanne's closest friends. One of them—Fay Becket—says, "When I first met Jeanne I thought she was just another dream girl." And Betty Ling adds, "Jeanne and I were the only young women at a party in Palm Springs the day we met. Naturally, I thought we'd have a lot in common, but I had to drag every word out of her. So then, of course, I thought, well, she's beautiful, but that's all." Jerry Hunt, wife of her business manager, says, "The first time I met Jeanne I was waiting for my husband in the car outside her home, and she insisted that I come in. I did, but she became almost silent as soon as I'd stepped inside the door. Then she took me to the nursery to see her baby (it was her first) and she talked a lot about him. I thought then that children would be all I'd ever talk about with her."

Eventually, though, Jeanne joined these ladies in their sewing circle. At first, they all had to laugh about it. "She couldn't even thread a sewing machine," says Jerry Hunt. "A sewing machine! Why, she couldn't even thread a simple needle. But three months later Jeanne made herself a felt skirt with caricatures on it that had everybody agog."

"That's what I love about Jeanne," Betty Ling says. "She grasps things so quickly that before we experts know it she's better than we are!"

"A few months after we met," Jerry Hunt recalls, "we invited her to go on a hunting trip. She was the first one to bring down a dove and she helped pluck the rest of them. I was amazed when she said she'd never been hunting before. And fishing. Naturally, now we all go fishing together, but even when Jeanne first started going with us she'd bring in a haul. 'How do you do it?' I asked her once, and she said, 'Oh, I just offered a little prayer to St. Peter.'"

But now let's really go back, far back into Jeanne's life when she had no thought of Hollywood, and try to find a key to her present personality. If Jeanne's mother were listening in to these descriptions of her daughter, she wouldn't blink an eye. She knows her girl. "Jeanne always mastered everything quickly," says her mother. "She learned to read at three, to swim expertly at five. Piano-playing, painting, ice-skating, tennis—she tried them all and did them all well. I used to pray that I would have the wisdom to guide her. But she was so introspective, it was hard to fathom her mind. I had reason to worry most when she entered her teens, because this was a hard time for her." And this was a time that might explain a lot that happened after.

In high school at 12, Jeanne was a straight A student. She was the youngest and the smartest and many of her classmates at St. Mary's Academy knew how to use her brain. On the day before a history test, for example, they'd gather around her and she'd condense pages of required reading on the Mayflower Compact into less than 50 words.

When she'd finish, one of the girls would turn to the others, saying, "Well, we won't have to study that tonight. How about going ice-skating instead?"

"But she'd never ask me," Jeanne still vividly recalls. "I was a pretty good ice-skater, too. Suddenly I saw I wasn't exactly in the swim. They gathered around me only at school and only because I was a brain!"

Believe it or not, Jeanne deliberately started making mistakes in order to get marks as low as her struggling fellow students. But that didn't increase her popularity. Then she thought the thing to do was to seek out popular girls and invite them places.

One night, she asked such a girl to have dinner, go to a football game and stay overnight with her. The girl refused politely; she had other plans, but the next day she called to ask what kind of time Jeanne had.

"Terrible," Jeanne moaned. "It's just as well you didn't go. It rained and . . ."

"Oh, that's a shame," sympathized the girl. "We had the most marvelous time!"

"When I hung up the phone," Jeanne reports now, "I said to my mother, 'Nobody else ever seems not to have a good time. Why is it I'm the only one who's disappointed?'

"Mother answered, 'They don't always have a good time. They just don't let the world know. People aren't attracted to those who are always disappointed.'"

Thinking that over, Jeanne realized that the popular girls made the smallest event seem exciting with their enthusiasm, or turned a mishap into an adventure.

"When I analyzed what they said, it was only small talk but it was magic at that age."

The first time Jeanne used this magic was when she went to a Junior Prom at another high school. Her escort wasn't the boy she'd wanted—the one she'd wanted hadn't asked her.

"For the first time I kept quiet about the other boy. Instead," she smiles, "I talked as though the boy I went with was the one! I raved about the wonderful time we'd had and about the other couple with us. It worked, too! The girls accepted me as a person, not a brain."

Jeanne was graduated from high school at 15, still under the spell of that victory. If people didn't react to brains, she'd be brainy enough not to act too bright! At 17, when she was signed by 20th Century-Fox, she concealed her real reason for wanting to be an actress. (That reason, by the way, was her desire to sample the kind of lives—through acting—which interested her.) She thought she'd entered a world that demanded beauty and small-talk, not brains and talent. Wasn't Vanessa Brown, a fellow player, bemoaning the fact that she couldn't make people forget she'd been a Quiz Kid?

"I didn't set foot inside the studio commissary for six months after I was signed," she says. "No one asked me and I couldn't face it alone. The adult world is actually quite a step from school. At least it was for me. I was very lonely."

Instead of people, books became her constant companions in her dressing room and between scenes on the sets. "The Fountainhead" set off her interest in architecture. Other books opened new fields to her.

When she did eat in the commissary, her beauty was a magnet. But the people who noticed her, noticed her silence, too. She absorbed all she heard and saw, but she talked little. Because she accepted all which came her way with serenity, she was called the most co-operative actress in the studio.

Only the fact of her marriage to Paul Brinkman, a man completely of her own choosing, indicated she was other than a wholly docile beauty.

Georgianna Montalban unconsciously reveals Jeanne's former attitude when she says, "One evening when she was here, Ricardo was simmering over being typed as a guitar-playing Latin lover, and threatening to insist that the studio give him meatier roles.

"Jeanne told him, 'The people who run studios see you objectively. It's pretty hard to see yourself that way even on the screen. But those men do. It takes time for them to find a role which gives your fans what they expect from you, plus something more challenging to you as an actor. Don't insist on anything in particular. Just be prepared for different types of roles, and if you're capable of playing them, sooner or later you will.'

"The more Ricardo thought about her words," Mrs. Montalban concludes, "the more sense they made to him. Now he's glad he didn't make a fuss because varied roles have been coming his way."

At that time, Jeanne firmly believed her words, and firmly felt that Pinky proved her right. But, oddly enough, the studio did not give her more challenging roles. She found herself doing more young girl parts, while the solid roles went to other actresses.

One day she exclaimed to Jerry Hunt, "I guess I've committed Hollywood's deadliest sin. I talk so much about my marriage and my children that nobody thinks I can talk about anything else."

Her rebellion grew and she decided to go after the role in People Will Talk. Joseph Mankiewicz was amazed. He, too, thought of her as "Margie." While they argued back and forth, Mankiewicz began to see her in a new light and seemed almost convinced that she'd be right for the part. But he told her, "I'm sorry, but Anne Baxter is being announced for the role tomorrow. We've already told her."

That stopped Jeanne, all right. But just before the picture was ready to go into production, Anne excitedly informed the studio that she and John Hodiak at long last were expecting a child, and she'd decided to withdraw from the movie.

Mankiewicz called Jeanne and told her to cut her hair, because she had the part. Jeanne cut it without a whimper, and then she sent him a huge bottle of champagne with a card attached that read, "If I fail you, you may pickle me in this!" He didn't. Without waiting for critics' opinions, he broke open the bottle at the end of production and everyone celebrated.

To hear her friends tell the difference a simple hair-cut has made in Jeanne is to hear a complete reversal of Samson's historical shearing.

"She's become even more exciting to her friends in the last few months," Betty Ling reports. "We knew a long time ago there was more to her than our first impressions led us to believe. But no matter what she wore or what she did before she cut her hair, that beautiful girlish mane blinded everyone to the sophistication which was there all the time."

"We used to tease her about her little girl clothes," her long-time pal Peggy O'Connor says. "But not any more. She's so chic now. We also noticed how shy she was around our husbands, too, but now she kids them just as naturally as can be.

"She can hold court in a discussion too. One day, not long ago, when our group started talking about religion and philosophy, Manning started needling her. He was raised by the Jesuits and is used to challenging most people when they talk on those subjects. Much to his surprise, she really put him in his place. Now he thoroughly enjoys seriously discussing the subject with her because he knows her faith comes through intelligence, not just pure emotionalism or childhood habit."

Enlarging this intimate picture of Jeanne, Fay Becket quotes her husband, world famous architect Welton Becket, who did Jeanne's home: "She knew just what she wanted and how to tell it." That's real praise from an architect. Mrs. Becket continues, "It's hard to give specific instances that illustrate Jeanne isn't just the dream girl I thought she was. Only the other night, though, we had a dinner party for eight. The men were financial experts and when their conversation swung in that direction, Jeanne astonished them by her knowledge of their field. It doesn't seem to matter what kind of expert is around, Jeanne can talk his language."

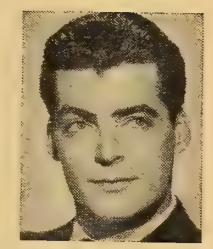
Business manager Wally Hunt confirms Jeanne's financial astuteness. "Her one fault is her over-generosity to charity," he says. "Every so often, I have to say, 'Wait a moment, what about yourself?' She'll just point to what she's allocated for herself on the budget and say, 'I'll manage on this.' She does, too. She's one of the very few creative people I know who lives within her budget. That's why she's in the good position she is. You don't have to talk baby talk to her when it comes to investments."

All these facets add up to a mature, sophisticated woman and her recent screen roles seem to indicate they add up to an actress whose performances will be eyed as possible Academy Award contenders.

Certainly the studio looks at her in this light now. Following People Will Talk came The Model And The Marriage Broker.

Paul Kohner, her agent, says with confidence, "This is just the beginning of Jeanne's real career. Her immaturity has always been an outward thing. She's most intelligent and adult. Of course she's playing a young girl again in Belles On Their Toes but that's a sequel to Cheaper By The Dozen and it's logical she should play the role."

Then why has Jeanne gone through those shallow phases of personality and career which were destructive to the ultimate goal she had set for herself?



Jeanne attributes it to the day at St. Mary's Academy when she decided it didn't pay to be a brain. Learning to deal successfully in small talk brought her that much desired youthful popularity as a person. Those impressions stayed with her too long.

How has she erased those teen-age scars?

The answer seems to lie in director John Huston's words, which Jeanne herself quotes: "In my work, I do only things to please myself. If the world in general happens to like something I do and is really moved by it, that's just good fortune. I don't know how to set about doing anything to please anyone else."

She feels that Huston expresses the thoughts of many people like herself. As a result she has become a mature actress and joins the company of such exceptionally successful women as Irene Dunne and Loretta Young. Self-assured, beautiful, charming, feminine women whose world includes a happy marriage, children and distinguished success. What more can any woman, and especially, a beautiful brain trust like Jeanne, ask of life? THE END

As my friend and I were leaving the theater we noticed two handsome fellows walking in back of two tiny girls. "That's Rory Calhoun," I yelled. My friend replied, "Yeah, look at these two kids in front of them." Rory laughed, for one of those "kids" was his wife!

is jean pete's pick?

(Continued from page 24) Inwardly, though, he must be aware of it, more now than ever. On his return from England, he went back to the home where he and his parents, Lord and Lady Lawford, have lived ever since he became an important star. But he must have found that his roots were no longer here in Hollywood, because for the first time in his life, Pete became a lonesome guy.

It is almost surprising that Peter Lawford is an actor at all—he is so completely and almost agonizingly normal. Consider his two best friends, for instance, the late Lieutenant Charlie Dunne and Bob Walker. Pete and Charlie met for the first time on the public beach at Santa Monica where they used to play volley ball with a gang of guys and gals. They had a strong common interest in athletics of all sorts, particularly surf-boarding at Malibu.

And Pete's other staunch friend, Bob Walker, was completely the opposite—the quiet, almost bookish type who preferred a tough session of poker to a walk around the block. Lawford has always had a lot in common with the friends he chose, plus one trait that set him completely apart. This was his constant itch for travel.

A friend who had invited Pete to dinner might get a telegram the day before, saying that the actor was en route to Bermuda.

As one buddy of his put it, "Oh, Pete's the dependable type, all right. He'll always get there, but he might occasionally be six months late for dinner."

"I'll admit it," he said, recently, "it's the escapist in me that makes me keep on the go so much. And don't make a big thing of it. I've never been running away from a particular thing or person. It's just that I've never built a life around myself consisting of a lot of possessions. And what's so unusual about that. I like to travel frequently, fast, and far."

And that's just what he has done, getting away from the intricate life of Hollywood that has tried to snare many young men like him into almost everything they didn't want, from business deals to marriage. He has always liked to choose romance, or find it by chance, not have it thrust on him because someone decided that the best thing for him would be to find a wife. In the past, Peter has taken everything Hollywood has been able to throw his way, with no outward evidence of being disturbed.

When one writer called him a "wolf," because of his numerous dates with the glamor girls, he was displeased, but didn't go around ranting and raving. When another called him "tight," because he didn't toss his money around, and never gave him credit for the manner in which he has so long been more than generous to his friends and relatives, there were still no attack of dramatics. He was well aware that on the surface these things seemed to have at least a trace of truth to them. But inwardly, he knew what he was and what he wanted.

It is this stubborn preference on Pete's part that has brought him the most important romance of his life. At first, none of his friends would believe it. Pete had gone to Honolulu on one of his sudden, unannounced vacations, and shortly thereafter his name began to be linked with a girl named Jean MacDonald. This linking business meant little to any of his friends. It happened all the time.

The seriousness of Pete's feeling for Jean, and vice-versa, didn't come into the open until many months later. Pete finished a picture called Kangaroo, for 20th Century-Fox, and he stopped off to visit Jean on the islands. She was working on a newspaper there, where her mother, Mrs. Marion Blair, is in the real estate business. And Jean, talking to Pete during the hours they spent together on the beach, told him of her journalistic ambitions. It was Pete who suggested that she come to the States, and find a job.

That's exactly what she did, some weeks later, only to discover that the vicinity of Hollywood is filled to the brim with young talent (she's 22), looking for magazine and newspaper work. It was only natural that Pete should help her all he could, but Jean insisted on making a go of it by herself. Fortunately, it was not a case of work or starve, so she free-lanced for awhile, and waited for an opening.

Now comes the coincidence at which the calloused characters of Hollywood love to wink. Jean found her chance for a job at Pete's own home studio, MGM. Knowing that it might cause some talk, she talked to Pete about taking over a position in the publicity department. He advised her to do exactly what she would do if she had never known him at all, so she took the job.

You have to live in Hollywood to realize what a tough situation something like this can be. There are movie stars who have friends among people who work in publicity departments, but these friendships usually are fleeting, and almost never on a socially equal basis. The whole town of Hollywood is marked by sharply defined levels of society.

There is the "A Group," the directors, producers, stars and top writers, who play tennis together, live in the same neighborhoods, marry and divorce each other endlessly. Then there is the "B Group," consisting of lesser players who can't afford big homes and Cadillacs. Their lives are emotionally mixed up with the assistant directors, the cutters, and others engaged in lesser capacities in helping to make movies. Last comes the "C" or fringe group: These are the publicity workers, magazine and newspaper writers. In themselves they are rather a happy and successful group, but their lives seldom cross those of the other groups.

To put it bluntly, a top feminine star falls in love with her press agent, only in novels, and never in Hollywood. And to desert delicacy completely, there are those who are now whispering off-stage, "Whatever in the world does Pete Lawford see in that little publicity girl?"

The answer is—plenty! Pete sees more in this slim, intelligent, dark-eyed Jean MacDonald than he has in any of the glamor girls with whom his name has been linked. The gossip inference is that Jean is a little Miss Nobody who has set her cap for Movie Star Lawford. And the inference is so strong that people in publicity have passed along the word to "soft pedal" the linking of their names.

Whether Jean MacDonald knows this, or knowing, is influenced by Hollywood's rather undemocratic attitude about the relationship between men and women in widely differing salary brackets, isn't possible to say. But someone should point out in print that Miss MacDonald's education and background is considerably superior to most movie stars, even though her salary of perhaps slightly more than $100 a week does not place her in the "A Group" of Hollywood society. And her all-around qualifications as a fit wife for Pete are undoubtedly ten times better than most of the several times divorced stars with whom his name has been linked off and on during the years.

While all this frankness is going on, it should also be known that Pete Lawford feels very deeply about Jean MacDonald. And between them, the ultimate mutual decision they make about the subject of marriage will be based on their love and respect for each other. If Pete Lawford asks her to be his bride (as he may before this article reaches print) it wouldn't make any difference to him whether she was a $5,000 a week star, a waitress in a drive-in, or sold papers on a street corner.

Among other things of which Pete has been accused is a too acute social consciousness. This stems largely from the fact that he is English, his father bears the title of Sir and his mother is always addressed as Lady Lawford.

The truth is that Pete has always been the most democratic of movie stars. Editors and reporters are not surprised to see him come strolling into their offices, unannounced. He drops in to say hello, if he likes them, and not for the purpose of getting his name into, or out of any magazine or newspaper.

Pete has always been like this and always will be. The only change in him, already mentioned, is increasing evidence of adulthood. Credit part of that to the loss of two of his closest friends, to his growing a little older, and to the increasing realization that much of Hollywood's attitude towards its stars is far less genuine and understanding than those who are on the "outside."

Delving into the facts still more, observers noted that when Pete was greeted by Jean at the airport when he arrived back from England after finishing T For Terror, he brought with him several gifts for her—a rollicking Boxer pup named Sam, and some attractive sweaters he'd picked up in Scotland.

It was expected, then, that this friendship would blossom into an altar-bound romance over-night. Certainly, Pete made no bones of the fact that he was barely interested in Sharman Douglas, an old flame whom he only saw once or twice while in England.

For several weeks, Jean and Pete were seen frequently together. Skiing with friends in the mountains, having dinner together at the quiet Ready Room restaurant, or hiking on the beach with Sam, the Boxer.

Everything seemed to be developing normally and naturally, until the sudden report from nowhere that the two had quarreled seriously. The suspicion is that Jean might have absorbed some of the always too freely given advice in some quarters to the effect that actors are insincere no-goods of whom a girl can't be too careful. She may have given Pete some sort of an ultimatum, to the effect that it would be better, considering their different stations in life as it's lived in Hollywood, for them to go their separate ways.

The facts are that when Pete momentarily stopped seeing Jean MacDonald, he took no other girls out . . . he continued to look for a home of his own, out around Brentwood and Pacific Palisades, and he temporarily stored the considerable amount of furniture and antiques which he had purchased in England.

There is no question that the course of Pete's life has completely changed, and the reasons are the factors which have been set down in this article. Today Pete Lawford is a finer actor than ever before, a more solid and thoughtful individual. He will always be a man who likes to travel at the slightest provocation, but the prediction here is that before long those trips of his will no longer be in the nature of solo flights.

He quite likely will have Mrs. Peter Lawford with him. THE END

"I'll never marry again"

I reminded Dan not so long ago, a very reputable reporter had quoted him at a party as saying that he was going to marry Miss Nigh. "Complete misunderstanding," Dan assured me. "This is what happened. I took Annie Miller to that party. And when I was asked if I had plans to marry Jane, I said no, but that if I did, kiddingly, I'd let the reporter know. I guess with all the noise around us she thought I said yes I was getting married to Jane. Jane was furious. Called me after reading the item, and said, 'If you are going to marry me, I think I ought to be told.'"

"Don't get me wrong about Jane. We have a lot of laughs together and she's swell. She's easy to be with, she can romp around in blue jeans, or dress up and look like a queen at a party. But we are not getting married." Don't take this to mean that Jane is not in love or ready to fall in love with Dan. He's the most likable and eligible bachelor we have. But I think Jane realizes he aims to stay one.

"How about you and Ann Miller going to London together next year to dance at the Palladium? If you do, won't that revive talk of a romance?" I ask Dan. "We'll do two weeks at the Palladium," says Dan. "But I'm not in love with Annie, and she's not in love with me. It'll take her a long time to want to marry anyone again." Ann never discusses her marriage and divorce from wealthy Reese Milner, but she was sick for months after losing her baby, and Milner soon after. It was a heart-breaking experience.

But like all of the girls he dates, Ann adores Dan. "He's the best companion I've ever had," she told me when I questioned her about seeing Dan so often. "And," she added unnecessarily, "he's a dreamboat and a dreamy dancer."

I can't understand a man like you, basically quiet and rather shy, dating a brash exhibitionist like Shelley Winters," says your reporter, digging into Dan's motives over the roast beef and baked potato. "Well, I'll tell you," says Dan. "Not many people understand Shelley. She's very frightened really, and the noise is a cover up. I like her, even if I don't want to marry her or any other girl in show business.

"It's like this with girls in show business," says Dan. "I have to work with them all day long on the set. A guy has to be careful how he handles them. I wouldn't want to come home and have to go through all that in the evening, too. I'd prefer someone who was more interested in my career, not interfering, of course. But telling me when this scene was good, and that, not so good. You know, making like she cared about my work. An actress is too busy caring about her own.

"But what other women do I have a chance of meeting? I've been in this business most of my life. I didn't go to college, I didn't belong to any fraternities. And I feel awkward when men who did talk about it. So I stick pretty close to people in show business. Those are the girls I know, and those are the girls I don't want to marry."

"How about June Haver?" I pause between pastry bites to ask.

"She's sweet, but can you see me married to June?" Dan demands. "I can't."

"That leaves Barbara Whiting," says I. He laughs. "What would I do with a young kid like that? Or with any young girl? I prefer people who know their way around. You know how it is with young girls. They hero worship a movie star. I couldn't take that as a steady diet."

"There are always girls in society," says I. "Wasn't your wife a local society girl?" Dan gives me a quizzical look, asks for the check, and says, "Let's you and I go to the Mocambo." So we leave the Encore and step into Dan's car—a Ford. "What happened to your Cadillac?" I ask, as we drive the short distance to the glossy night club on the Strip. "My wife took it, along with everything else," says Dan, a bit on the grim side, but not for long. Smiling comes just naturally to him, and being kind. I'm sure that his ex-wife is going to wake up one day and say, "Why in heck did I ever lose him?"

"Liz, you were asking about Liz," says Dan, when we sit against the plush wall inside the darkened Mocambo. "That 'society' business, where did you get it from? Her family was wealthy, that's all. She was terribly unhappy at home. I was sorry for her. When I had to go overseas during the war, in '42, we married.

"We were never really in love," confesses Dan. "Her family hates actors, they made it difficult for us. But at the beginning, when we didn't have much, we were quite happy. And when Danny was born, I thought this was it—I had a home, paid for, money in the bank, horses, a good job, a son, a beautiful wife. All the things I thought I had wanted all my life. Something to build a good future on. But then Liz changed. She was restless, didn't know what she wanted, but it obviously wasn't me. When she told me she wanted a divorce, I begged her to reconsider. It seemed such a wanton waste of what could have been a secure happy life.

"That's when I became so confused. I was working very hard and the combination finally landed me in the Menninger Clinic. It turned out to be the best thing that ever happened to me. I learned to re-value what I had, and find out what I wanted. The first thing they taught me there was to get outside myself. That's what makes people unhappy, especially women. They're absorbed with themselves. You have to forget yourself to be happy. When a woman obsessed with herself loses her looks, heaven help her.

"There was a publisher at the Clinic. Yes, he was there for treatment too. A lot of the cases were really bad, but the Menningers' will never take a patient unless they believe they can effect a cure. I was advised to write as therapy. I showed some of my pieces to the publisher. He said they were obviously amateurish, but that I had the faculty of putting down on paper the way people actually speak.

"And I started to write songs at Menninger's. Now I write two songs a week. One day,"—and Dan points to singer Billy Daniels, "he'll be telling his audience, 'Ladies and Gentlemen, this next song you are about to hear was written by a movie actor—Dan Dailey.'" And Dan laughs again, that easy laugh of his.

Dan was in the Menninger Clinic about six months, at a cost of $1,500 a month. "But it was worth every cent. I wish Liz would have gone there, it might have given her a sense of real values. Sure I see a lot of Liz now, we went with our little son Danny to Lake Arrowhead in the summer. She lives a few blocks from my apartment in Beverly Hills and any time I want to see Danny, I just walk in. Liz is out of town a lot, restlessly looking for whatever it is she wants, then I have Danny stay with me."

THE two Dans are close buddies. "We sleep in twin beds in the same bedroom in my apartment, I get his breakfast and take him with me to the studio. That's my life and I want him to know it. He has a ball on the set, they let him ride with the camera, and if he gets in anyone's way they just put him aside. But he's a good kid. There are so many things I won't ever know about him, because he lives with his mother most of the time. But my work—that we can have in common.

"What makes you so sure you'll never marry again?" says I after an exhilarating whirl around the dance floor in Dan's arms. "Come to my home sometime and you'll understand better," invites Dan. "I'm happier living alone. After I left the Clinic I stayed for six months with Al Melnick and his family. (Al's Dan's

IT HAPPENED TO ME

Before leaving Texas for art school in New York, my mother warned me, "Now, don't take up with strangers!"

One day I was rushing to a class from a downtown exhibit and found myself trapped on the wrong side of Fifth Avenue while a Memorial Day parade passed by. Tanks, soldiers, and more soldiers passed endlessly and I began to be worried about missing my class.

A man beside me said, "I want to get to the other side, too, but it doesn't do any good to worry about it. So . . . just enjoy the parade." I decided he was right and I stopped worrying, but remembering my mother's advice, I wouldn't look at him.

Finally, the parade ended and as I crossed the street, I saw the man go hurriedly on his way. Then I wished I had talked to him, for the "friendly stranger" was no stranger at all . . . but Bing Crosby himself.

Mrs. W. M. Curtis

agent and closest Hollywood friend.) I had to figure out what I wanted to do. When everything was clear in my mind, and I was ready for responsibility again, I looked for an apartment. I have a wonderful butler; he was found for me by Barbara Whiting's family. He comes in every day at 12. It's wonderful not to have to talk to any one in the morning, you must know how that is. My man's a wonderful cook, as good as any wife could be, he looks after me fine. I watch television for hours at night, and I have my books on psychiatry. But I haven't been to a psychiatrist since I left the Clinic. My friends think I live with psychiatrists and always ask me for advice. I don't need psychiatrists any more. I'm happy, but my friends go to them all the time."

"Why do the Menninger doctors believe it's bad for you to fall in love?" I ask Dan as we drive to my home. "I guess they think it's better for me not to have any problems. But Sheilah, how could a wife improve my position? I go home when I like, see whom I like, make as much noise as I like, dress as I like. Tonight I wore a tie for you. But usually just a shirt and pants. My career is doing great, I make thousands of dollars a week —it all goes in taxes, but still I make it, and it thrills me to see those checks.

"But don't get me wrong, I love girls. And my idea of a wonderful girl is someone very feminine, whose arms are soft when she puts them around my neck. But no falling in love." When Dan perceives the slightest hint of possessive love, he's off in the opposite direction before she can say, "Kiss me." "That's something I like to say anyway—I mean, 'Kiss me,'" Dan laughs, stops the car before my house, and hops out to open the door for me.

"Before you go," says I, "What would you say is your philosophy of life in general?"

"Sounds corny," Dan answers, "but it's this, 'Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.' Then you are sure to hurt nobody."

I've enjoyed my evening and I tell him so. "So have I," says Dan. "How about dinner one day next week?"

I hope this means I've joined his rotating line of ladies. My head is certainly spinning enough to qualify. He's a sweet guy to be with. Easy to talk to, gay, friendly. But I can't promise not to fall in love with him. I'm kidding of course—on the level. THE END and A Streetcar Named Desire. . . . Fred Astaire says Donald O'Connor won't make HIS life story. Fred himself will do it, sezze, if it's ever screened.

Imagine Clifton Webb making life miserable for a professional wrestler. It's true. Guy's name is Sandor Szabo. 20th hired him for some rough wrestling scenes with our boy friend Belvedere in Dream Boat. And Sandor had to cancel his grunt-and-groan sessions on evening TV shows because Clifton fought him to a frazzle during their daytime hours on the studio soundstage! . . . Now that the Katie Grayson-Mario Lanza feud is out in the open, will she bust loose with the story about how she bit his lip when he made her mad during a romantic scene for Toast Of New Orleans? . . . Oleg Cassini had his foot on a Hollywood-bound plane when Gene Tierney filed that fast divorce action. He put it back on the ground. . . . Errol Flynn started the year with four lawsuits. One was his own, against Duncan McMartin, the others were against him: Lili Damita's for $62,000, Bill Marshall's for $25,000, and a third for an unpaid tailor's bill in Australia.

Katie & Mario

DANCING DOLLS:

A bright new ballerina, Britain's Claire Bloom, will soon be grabbing headlines as Charlie Chaplain's leading lady in Limelight. But Charlie, who did it with Paulette Goddard once too, won't let the photogs flashbulb Claire till he's ready to turn on the publicity guns. . . . Virginia Mayo plays a character named "Hot Garters Gertie" in her next picture, She's Working Her Way Through College. . . . Sally Forrest is taking dancing lessons from Rita Hayworth's father, Jose Cansino.

HE WENT THATAWAY:

Randy Scott, after all these years, just bought himself his first tuxedo. . . . If studio dressing rooms could talk, there's one at Republic that could say a mouthful. Vaughn Monroe inherited Roy Rogers' dressing room when he checked into the San Fernando Valley lot March 3. It's the one that Rogers, in turn, inherited from Gene Autry not so long ago. And both Rogers and Autry left Republic in a HUFF, if you'll recall! . . . Roy is making TV Westerns now. One day last month his posse overrode a scene, running out of camera range, at Iverson's Ranch, and wound up in a Crucifixion procession being shot by the producer of a religious film! They had an awful time separating the cowboys from the long-bearded actors!

Rogers

While visiting out at Republic, we saw John Agar and Ruth Hussey stroll into a saloon. But if the probation department reads this and wonders if John isn't being a good boy after his jail sentence we've got to add that it was for a scene in Minnesota. . . . Indians who used to work on location in Westerns for as little as $3 a day won't work for a dime less than $9 a day now! . . . While locationing on The Saber And The Arrow in Yuma, Brod Crawford and Barbara Hale put on a benefit and raised $2,000 for the Arizona Boys' Ranch. . . . Clyde Beatty is planning on invading Bill "Hopalong Cassidy" Boyd's territory. Beatty has a line of jungle outfits for kids coming up, and hopes they'll do as well as Hoppy's cowboy duds have been doing.

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Louis and Quique Jourdan bragged to me about their new baby. "He's got my head, eyes and nose," Louis said, "but he looks just like his mother!" . . . Danny and Marie Thomas celebrated their 16th wedding anniversary at Mocambo helping Fran sing one of Danny's I'll See You In My Dreams songs. "It Had to Be You" . . . Eleanor Parker rented a trailer, drove it to Tucson and lived in it there while locationing with Bob Taylor in Eagle On His Cap . . . Cyd Charisse and Tony Martin are making tape recordings of their Tony, Jr.'s progress instead of taking 16mm movies, as do other parents. Reason, a fairly obvious one: Tony's a singer. . . . MGM tried to keep it a secret, but starlet Paula Raymond is the mother of a four-year-old girl. She's divorced from her first husband.

Hayworth

Burt Lancaster got his first look at his new baby, now eight months old, when he returned from making a picture in Europe. His Norma brought the infant to the airport to meet Pop. . . . Diana and John Anderson will make Joan Bennett a grandmother again in April. . . . Stewart Granger gifted Jean Simmons with diamond earrings on their first wedding anniversary. . . . Rita Hayworth is in Hollywood only for a visit, believe it or not. This isn't her legal home. She's a legal resident of Nevada, at least till the divorce from Aly Khan goes through. . . . Rita may be broke, as of now, but she won't be for long—at $250,000 per picture and 25 percent of the profit. Even Clark Gable doesn't have such a lush deal. . . . Didja know the only jewelry Rita has been wearing for the past several months is a handmade St. Christopher medal with a few diamonds imbedded here and there!

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Doris Day's first year of canarying for Columbia Records earned her $103,000, and that ain't birdseed. . . . Maureen O'Sullivan does better financially as the mother of seven than she ever did as a star. She got $10,000 for posing for two days for some baby oil ads! . . . John Derek is now getting $750 a week at Columbia, where he started for literally peanuts, but he's still loaded with bills and can't finish furnishing his Encino home, even if it does have a swimming pool!

Derek

Guy who sublet Betsy von Furstenberg's apartment when she returned to New York to appear in a play found something while rummaging around in the feminine debris she left behind; an MGM paycheck for $173 that she had forgotten to cash. . . . Here we are on the subject of Doris Day again: She's No. One boxoffice queen out at Warners' but in one of her upcoming pictures she has only six pages of dialogue out of an entire script. What a waste of talent! Warner's, why don't you wise up?

FOUR-LEGGED FRIENDS:

Big Noise, the Betty Grable-Harry James racehorse, won $80,000 for them last year. Betty says she'll settle for that anytime in lieu of an Academy Award. . . . Did you know that the James' nags won several stakes during Betty's suspension, and the winnings helped carry the load of her layoff no end? In fact, Betty bought a new bleached seal coat with just a fraction of the take on Big Noise alone. . . . Alan and Sue Ladd bought a new dachshund to replace the one that was killed. . . . And Alan couldn't go to work in Botany Bay at Para one morning because he'd been up all night tending a horse on his Hidden Valley ranch that got stuck in a watering trough. Before strangling itself to death, the poor animal took a severe bite out of Alan's helping hand—the right one.

Grable

The Siamese cat that Roz Russell carries onstage in her play, Bell, Book and Candle, is not a prop but her very own. . . . Leslie Caron named her new beige-colored afghan hound Lana! . . . Bob Ryan is taking lessons in how to train his new dogs—a boxer and a terrier.

TIME TABLES:

Howard Duff and Ida Lupino moved from Malibu to Hollywood so that Ida, who was expecting, wouldn't have so far to drive while producing and directing at RKO. . . . Ida worked, and hard, although her medico advised her to spend as much time as possible in bed until the baby came, because of an old back injury. . . . Pier Angeli, who just learned to drive a car, is now learning to drive a jeep on MGM's Lot Three for her next role—and they've moved everything movable out of the way! Go to it Pier!

Mala Powers and Piper Laurie wrote their names in lipstick on a big shell during their trip to Korea and then saw it fired into the communist lines. . . . Jerry Wald told me it'll be only a matter of a few months before Barbara Stanwyck's next picture, Clash By Night, puts her back in the same strong position occupied by Joan Crawford after Mildred Pierce was released and won her an Oscar. . . . Margaret O'Brien ordered a flock of off-the-shoulder gowns from dress designer Sari Taffy. Time flies, kids! Pretty soon that O'Brien gal will be keeping us columnists busy!

still in love with aly?

(Continued from page 37) What magic words had Aly uttered to so weaken Rita's determination for freedom? "He just wanted to ask about the children and wish us a very happy New Year. That's all," was Rita's explanation.

Which leaves you with nothing but the fact that 30 minutes is an awfully long time for a simple New Year's greeting.

It seems more likely, in view of Rita's present attitude, that Aly spent most of the time confessing his love, talking reconciliation and exploring the possibility of his flying to Hollywood to see Rita and his child. It may well be that he ended up by pleading with his beautiful wife to leave open the door of marriage.

Undoubtedly, Aly Khan is still very much in love with Rita—and always has been. When she left him last spring, he wrote her a long letter which read, in part: "I certainly do not want to remarry or have any woman in my heart except yourself . . . You can hardly imagine how I feel your loss, and as long as there is a particle of hope, I for my part will not wish to lose it . . . If in time your thoughts ever turn to me and the love I have always had for you, my arms are then open . . ."

A girl who recently went dancing with Aly at the Copacabana Palace in Rio (after the Prince's New Year's call to Rita) confessed to a friend, "Aly is still mad about Hayworth. I think she did exactly the right thing by leaving him. Now he wants her all the more, and he'll do anything to get her back, because not only love but his precious ego is involved."

IN Hollywood, there are some who say that the only reason Rita is even entertaining the thought of a reconciliation is because she's so desperately unhappy at Columbia Studios.

A friend of hers recently told a reporter, "Rita feels that anything, even life with Aly Khan, is preferable to fighting constantly with her studio."

This is an exaggeration, of course. Rita fights with her studio not because she's imperious. She fights because she wants to make the best motion pictures possible.

The truth is that when she returned to Hollywood from Reno several months ago and announced her intention of going back to work, the studio had no script ready for her. Writers were put to work on several projects, and when 63 pages of a story entitled Affair In Trinidad were finished, they were sent to Rita. Simultaneously came the announcement that she would star in the film opposite Glenn Ford.

Rita refused to do the picture until she had read the entire script. This seemed eminently reasonable under the circumstances. After all, when you try for a comeback after three years absence you want to be sure you're not in a flop. Rita felt that she needed more than just 63 pages of script before she could make a decision. So the studio suspended her. Rita then said she would make the picture providing it was the last one she made at Columbia. (Her contract has four more years to run.) The studio told her to go fly a kite and kept her on suspension.

Glenn Ford then walked into Harry Cohn's office and explained that he didn't want to co-star in the film with Rita, mainly because he had received two attractive offers from Universal and MGM and had no idea when Trinidad would begin at Columbia.

Cohn told him to take it easy, that everything would work out.

A day later, Rita sent telegrams to all the members of the press inviting them to a conference so that she could explain her position about the film. That afternoon, the studio's legal department got in touch with her and suggested that she read her contract. This she did, and found a clause in fine print prohibiting her to hold press conferences about any studio product, whereupon Rita sent out another batch of wires cancelling her previous date.

The studio then announced that Rita would report to work opposite Glenn Ford in Affair In Trinidad almost immediately.

By the time you read this, Affair In Trinidad will be finished, and Rita once again will be making every possible attempt to get away from Columbia.

Hollywood cynics say that this is why she's interested in Charley Feldman, the 47-year-old head of Famous Artists, a talent agency. Feldman is a potent force in movie politics and conceivably might be able to talk Columbia into releasing her.

Hollywood romantics, on the other hand, point out that Rita is handled by the William Morris Agency, and that her relationship with Feldman has nothing to do with business, but everything to do with love.

"Charley," it has definitely been said, "is another of Rita's strange love problems. He's nuts about her—but would he marry her if she were free? He's had one disastrous marriage, and nowadays, he seems very much the bachelor."

Feldman is a millionaire who not only guides the careers of Kirk Douglas, Tyrone Power, Susan Hayward, Charles Boyer, Marlene Dietrich, George Raft, and dozens of others, but he also helps produce motion pictures. His share of the profits from A Streetcar Named Desire will probably hit two million.

He lives lavishly on a scale to which Rita became accustomed when she married Aly.

Rita says, "Charley Feldman and I are just old friends. Occasionally, we spend a little time together. But talk about romance is simply nonsense. I'm still a married woman."

This may be true but then again Aly Khan was a married man when he met and fell in love with her.

An acquaintance of Charley's says, "I really think he's fallen for Rita. After all, that isn't hard. She's really beautiful and since her marriage to Aly, she has a very fascinating background. In fact, I think Charley took off for Bermuda only to give himself a chance to look at things objectively."

Rita, of course, has been seen with a number of men around Hollywood including Cy Howard, Gilbert Roland, Benny Holtzman, Jackson Leighter, and others, but she insists that right now she is interested in her children and career.

To date, Rita's problems are: (a) Shall she take back Aly Khan? (b) Shall she obtain her divorce and give up all hope of obtaining a financial settlement for Yasmin? (c) Shall she start playing the field

I SAW IT HAPPEN

I was late for my appointment at the Bethesda Medical Center. I rushed down the hall, only to collide with another woman. Grabbing my arm, Rosalind Russell smiled, said, "Square your hat, sailor," and sent me on my way.

Mrs. J. G. Bumgarner
Albuquerque, New Mexico

with an idea towards future matrimony? (d) Shall she marry again and abandon her career? (e) Shall she forget men (they've caused her so much heartache in the past) and concentrate on her children and career?

These are pretty complex problems. Take the first one, for example. Suppose Aly Khan should turn up in Hollywood, and suppose he and Rita should reconcile, this means that Rita must pack up and move back to the Riviera. She would also have to relinquish her career or perhaps start a new one in Europe.

Rita likes Europe very much. She believes, in fact, that her two girls would be very well off in Swiss schools, but what she refuses to put up with is Aly Khan's European conduct. Around Monaco, Aly is recognized as a man who loves the gaming tables. Rita does not care for gambling in any form.

She is wise enough to know, too, that Aly is not going to change—not at his age. He has never worked for a living, and there is no reason to believe that he suddenly will start now.

Despite all this, she loves him. She risked her career for him before they were married and abandoned it afterwards.

Rita can have her reconciliation for the asking. All she has to do is pick up the phone, and in a matter of weeks she will be living once again at the Chateau de l'Horizon. She will be living in the lap of luxury, far away from Columbia Studios.

There is no chance whatever of Aly's becoming an American citizen, since the bulk of his father's fortune is tied up in sterling, and there is no way of transferring it into American dollars. This was once suggested as the solution to Rita's foremost problem but it is out of the question, since Aly would never give up any of his European estates.

If Rita goes through with her divorce and writes Aly off as husband number three and a bad bargain at that, she will probably get very little money for Yasmin.

When Rita married Aly, she promised to raise any offspring in the Moslem faith. She intends to keep her word, but rearing Yasmin as a Moslem is practically impossible in Hollywood.

There is also the question of visitation rights. Aly will undoubtedly want to spend some time with his little daughter. How much time will the court permit? Will Rita take Yasmin to France during the summers?

Rita has always felt bitter about Aly's refusal to settle $3,000,000 on Yasmin which, reputedly, is the amount he settled on each of his two sons by a previous marriage. Actually, Aly doesn't have that kind of money, and, as he told Rita, there is no danger that Yasmin will be disinherited. "Under Moslem law," he said, "a man cannot disinherit any of his heirs, nor can he give more to one son or daughter than to another. According to that law, whether I like it or not, Yasmin will inherit one-fifth of my property."

Rita is not particularly worried about Yasmin's inheritance; she's worried about her upbringing. Certainly, Aly Khan, divorced or not, should be partly responsible for that. Rita herself has never asked for alimony.

In all fairness to Aly, it should be said that he is not dodging any of his responsibilities. He's willing to pay for Yasmin's support. He simply doesn't want Yasmin's mother to leave him for good.

Aly is shrewd enough to realize that Rita may talk all she wants to about furthering her career, but love is always infinitely more important to her. If she divorces him, she will certainly remarry.

"Right now," Rita says, "I contemplate no change whatever in my status." All of which means that until she irrevocably casts the die, Aly Khan is still top man in Rita's life.

A reconciliation at this point would surprise absolutely no one. THE END

"I love you, chata!"

(Continued from page 41) air, we had no idea, but we took them and we clinked them together and said "Merry Christmas."

And later on, on the ground, we didn't speak of the things we had talked of on the plane, because we were friends. And then, believe it or not, I gave him a pink horse that was four feet long and three feet tall, so he could take it home to his wife. And the last I saw of him he was walking away with the horse under his arm, waving a Merry Christmas.

What happened on that airplane started in a very exotic setting. It was eight o'clock in the morning. The early plane from Mexico City to Acapulco was just coming in for a landing. From where I sat I could see the mountains that the pilot was swinging through, and when he banked to get into the field traffic pattern I caught sight of a patch of the bluest water I had ever seen. Then, with the flaps almost tucked under the giant wings, the ship shuddered softly into a landing, the door was opened, and the hot air of the tropics swept in.

To understand why anyone would go to Acapulco one must go there. The first sight is of a sea-scape that will never be adequately described. There are tall bending palms and a beach so white that the sands must be sifted and bleached by hand to attain such perfection. And all along the shore the breakers roll in, purple at the base and white on top, as even as teeth in a comb. The airport, at arrival or departure time, is alive with brown men in whites dashing about, even in the heat, at a hundred chores.

On the way to the city, which is a 20 minute drive from the airport, a visitor will see every photograph he's ever looked at in a travel bureau booklet on beautiful Mexico. There are the tiny burros, ridden by men twice their size, ambling down the roads, the sombrero'd riders twitching their flanks with twigs and dragging their feet on the ground. There are children, naked as nature, playing in the fields with strange looking dogs. There are the women with postures like Vogue models carrying tremendous bundles of wash, or tubs of water, or bound branches of wood on their heads. And along the roadsides there are houses that might have been built 500 years ago.

In the city of Acapulco it is much the same, except that the houses are closer together and the sidewalks are paved and there are peculiar foreign signs saying Coca-Cola and Chesterfield. But on the outskirts of the city there are magnificent luxury hotels.

I HAD been in my room in one of these hotels only a few minutes when the phone rang. It was a friend from Hollywood who had heard I was coming. He invited me to come over to breakfast at John Wayne's house. He said he'd send a driver.

Although we had both worked in Hollywood for 20 years, I had never met John Wayne. After I climbed the 50 steps to the veranda of his house, I got my first close-up look at him. He was seated at the head of a large table set for breakfast.

The Quimbys don't believe in ads

You can't fool the Quimbys with any fancy advertising! They don't even read the ads.

Back in the days when all of our modern household conveniences were first advertised, lots of folks rushed out and bought them—later when the ads told of new and better models, they traded the old ones in. Still are!

But not the Quimbys!

The Quimbys just don't know very much about these things of modern America—and they don't own any of them!

And what you don't know can't hurt you—unless you want to enjoy life!

We think the Quimbys have been overlooking a mighty good thing.

The manufacturers of the products you buy have been trying to outdo each other for years to bring you new conveniences, new ideas . . . new improvements on the old . . . all of which have given us more of the good things of life than any other country in the world!

Companies can only grow when more people prefer their brand names. No matter how large or how small firms might be—you the consumer by your daily brand selections have the first and last word about their future.

In this land of trademarks, you, the consumer, are the Boss. Remember the brands you see advertised in this magazine—and buy where you see them featured.

Also at the table were a producer, a director and a business manager. After introductions I, too, sat down, but I felt like an interloper. The talk, during the meal, was inconsequential, no business—but I wasn't included very much. I had heard that Wayne was wary of reporters and although he was the soul of politeness, I wasn't sure he liked me there. We ate, by the way, bananas plucked from the trees that overhung the porch.

During that first day in Acapulco I spent a good deal of time with John Wayne and his pals. We sat at the beach under a cement canopy and dunked in the water of the lagoon regularly. We had cocktails on the terrace. This involved pulling coconuts from the trees (that also surrounded the house), chopping their heads off, stuffing them with ice—and a drop or two of rum—and sipping the milky liquid through straws. And I had dinner there also.

Dinner was a festive occasion. The house overlooked the sea on a cliff. The terrace was big and the other rooms had no doors, so the area was large and the 30 people who had been invited didn't crowd the place. The food was being served buffet style. There were tiny crisp-fried fish, miniature clams baked in rice, a variety of enchiladas, beef sautéed in a sauce that seemed to be made of cream and mustard and a dozen other things that a fat Mexican cook and her helper had spent the entire day preparing.

Everyone seemed to be having a good time but Wayne. A troupe of Mariachis walked among the guests strumming guitars and singing Mexican ballads. There was light laughter and banter and Carlos, the white-shirted, ever-smiling houseboy seemed to be having the time of his life taking care of everyone's needs. John Wayne was standing over at the far end of the terrace, his foot on a low guard rail, looking at the moon shimmering on the sea. He was dressed in whites and looked like something out of a Somerset Maugham novel, particularly in that setting.

Carlos came over and asked me if I'd like a cocktail. Although I'd made a pig of myself on the food, I said I would, when Wayne spoke.

"The man is a visitor, Carlos," he said. "Let's give him something to remember Mexico."

He came over, took me by the arm, and we followed the now delighted Carlos to the small bar.

"Vino del pais," Wayne said.

Carlos brought a basket of cut limes from beneath the bar, set down a shaker of salt and reached for a bottle.

"Vino what?" I asked.

"Vino del pais," said Wayne. "In English—the Wine of The Country. Tequila."

Carlos put the bottle of tequila on the mahogany bar and set a couple of glasses before it and stood there and grinned. Following Wayne's gestures, I picked up a small cut of lime in my left hand, sprinkled the area behind my thumb with salt and, with my right hand, picked up the glass of tequila.

"Your health," said Wayne. He sucked the lime, licked at the salt, threw the tequila into his mouth and sucked at the lime again. I sucked the lime, licked at the salt, tossed the tequila into my mouth—and spat it out as fast as I could.

Wayne and Carlos started to laugh. They held their sides and laughed at the stranger who tried to drink the Mexican national drink like a native. I got sore.

"Fill it up again, Carlos," I said.

He did. And he filled Wayne's glass. John held his up to me and we clicked them together.

"Salud y pesetas y tiempo para gastarlas!" he said. "That means health, wealth and the time to enjoy them."

"Slainte agas saogail agat!" I said. "That means Health and Life to you."

"What kind of language is that?" said Wayne.

"That's Irish," I said. And I licked the salt, sucked the lime, downed the tequila and licked the salt again. "I did it sort of backwards," I said, "but it takes an Irish toast to drink that kind of stuff."

Wayne laughed harder than before and Carlos followed suit, although he didn't completely understand. Then Wayne downed his drink. "Let's get something more to eat," he said.

I had eaten more than my share, but I went with him.

During the next few days we saw a good deal of each other. Any reserve that had been there at the beginning was gone. We had a lot of fun. We visited the swimming beaches and the boating beaches. We lunched and dined together. One night we did the town together and closed it—and that's hard in Acapulco.

Wherever he went in Acapulco, John Wayne was a celebrity. Not because he was a movie star, but because he was the biggest, lustiest, handsomest man in Mexico. His free and easy manner with the natives made him a hero with them. They liked the way he smiled, and the way he conducted himself like a guest in their country, rather than a rich American spending his money. He was the most popular man in Acapulco—and I was his strongest adherent.

We never talked much about John Wayne until one night when we were having dinner at La Perla, Acapulco's most famous night club and, as far as those who have traveled the world are concerned, the most beautiful in existence. It is carved out of the solid cliff in steps, narrow terraces that are semi-circular, because it lies at the head of a narrow gorge facing the sea. We had eaten and were sitting quietly indulging in the breeze that funnelled up the spout between the cliffs. Some people from Memphis at the next table asked Wayne to come over and have his picture taken with them. He did.

When he got back I asked him how he had ever gotten into pictures.

"I don't know," he said. "I guess I was lucky and a few people believed in me. On my own I'd probably have been a plumber."

"But you like it," I said.

"I make a living having my picture taken," he said. "It's a way to make a living."

"What are you doing down here?" I asked.

He looked at me sharply. "I'm vacationing," he said.

I wanted to ask, "Alone?" but I didn't. Instead, we spoke of other things. We talked about how he had gotten his first break in pictures. How much he owed to John Ford, and how much he loved and respected him. We talked about cows and people and cameramen. We talked about everything but John Wayne and Chata and why he was alone in Mexico just before Christmas.

There was nothing he could have told me about his wife. I knew, from living in Hollywood and reading the papers, all there was to know. She was a beautiful woman, young and talented and vivacious. She was half Mexican and half French. She was a spunky girl who might, by some people, be called temperamental—and I knew that John Wayne had married her because he was in love with her—and he did nothing, including loving, by half measures.

He had named her Chata because of her pug nose and because that was Mexican for pug nose. They lived in a house in the San Fernando Valley that was a man's house, filled with guns and saddles and the things a man likes to have around. They were a volatile couple, but there had never been a hint of serious trouble in their home. But why was he in Mexico alone just before Christmas?

The next day we didn't talk about anything but Ireland. Wayne had just come back. He had been making The Quiet Man there with John Ford directing. He told me how much he liked the Irish people—and how very much they were like the stories he had read of them. We never mentioned Chata.

When it came time to leave it was a sad parting, but a gala occasion. Like the guy who cries when he sees the shadow of beeeeeautiful Hawaii fading into the horizon, I had a lump in my throat. Many of the friends I had met in Acapulco came to see me off, and John Wayne, in shorts and a gay shirt was with them. We shook hands.

"You're a crazy sonovagun," he said. "I'll tell you what. Forget about me. I'll write a story about you."

"That's a deal," I said. "See you when you get back home."

I boarded the plane and once again looked out the window as the pilot slithered through the mountains to a height that would take us away from the tropics. And then Acapulco was gone.

The airlines, because of the pre-holiday traffic, were jammed, so it was necessary for me to stay in Mexico City for two days. That got me out on Christmas Eve.

THE night before I was to leave, I toured the city, in the midst of the Christmas gaiety. The Mexicans enjoy Christmas. They celebrate it at parties called Pasadas, which are held for a week preceding the holiday. And there is one fixture at these parties that represents something very much like our Christmas tree. It is called a Pinata. It is designed in the form of a duck, a horse, an elephant or some other animal. It is made of paper, but the center is a clay bowl. The Pinata is attached to a strong rope. It is pulled to the ceiling and a guest at the party is blindfolded and given a large stick, about the size of a baseball bat. He is then turned loose and told to hit the Pinata and break the clay bowl, which contains gifts and treats for everyone. While the boy or girl is swatting at the Pinata, it is pulled to the ceiling by the rope, firecrackers are set off at his feet, and everyone has a high old time laughing at the antics of the stick-swinger who whacks the air as the Pinata is lowered and raised out of his reach by the rope.

That night before I went to bed I bought a Pinata to take home. It was a pink horse, made of paper with a clay pot in the middle. When I showed up at the Mexico City airport the next afternoon they thought it was very odd, but the customs passed me, because they thought I was a crazy American.

I had ten minutes before plane time so I went into the coffee shop at the airport to wait. I had just ordered when the door flew open and in walked John Wayne.

"I thought about it," he said, "and I figured you'd never make it alone, so I decided to come along with you."

We sat and grinned at each other and when our plane was called we boarded it we took seats side by side and fastened our safety belts.

We had been in the air an hour, maybe, before we spoke.

"Why did you really catch this plane?" I asked him.

"I want to spend Christmas with my wife," he said.

"Trouble?" I asked.

"You know it," he said.

"Yeah—I know it," I said.

"Thanks for not asking me about it in Acapulco," he said.

"I couldn't get it out," I said. "I should have, you know."

"I know," he said. "That's why I said thanks."

"I hope it works out okay," I said. "I hope you both work it out—maybe tomorrow, Christmas."

"So do I," he said. And then, for the first time I've ever heard them said by an actor without a camera, I heard John Wayne say three words. Three famous words that are seldom spoken with the proper feeling in Hollywood. "I love her," he said.

And then the pretty little Mexican hostess came by with the cocktails on the tiny silver tray and John Wayne and I touched glasses and said, "Merry Christmas."

"Look," I said. "Back in the tail of this plane I've got a Pinata—a pink horse Pinata—it's four feet long and three feet high, and I guarantee you no girl in California will have such a Christmas present tomorrow. Take it home to her. And another thing, you talk too much."

The last I saw of him he was walking across the airfield with the pink horse under his arm. THE END

The trespassers packed up their basket and blanket and piled into their station wagon. As they pulled away, Betty heard one of the teen-agers say, "The older girl in the middle looks awfully familiar, Ma. I suppose we've seen her in the movies?"

At dinner that evening Harry James heard three versions of the visiting pickers. Vicki said it was she who had discovered the intruders, and Jessie's tale evolved around how she planned to treat the very next stranger who set foot on James' land. "I'll get my gun, Daddy," he vowed, "and shoot those varmints dead."

Harry looked at Betty.

"Television," Betty said. "All her dialogue comes straight from television."

Harry smiled. "What I'm wondering," he said, "is how come people mistake our place for Griffith Park?"

"The truth is," Betty pointed out, "that it does look like a park, and just as inviting, too. Maybe it shouldn't look so inviting."

Harry thought for a minute. "I guess we'll have to change the landscaping, honey. No fooling."

THE Harry James' house is a quarter of a century old, and its landscaping—until Harry decided to change it—resembled a golf course, for this was considered fashionable 25 years ago. Nowadays, the trend is towards informal privacy.

Since it was Harry who had bought the house and re-modeled it from the inside, Betty thought it only fitting that he do a complete job and remodel the outside.

"When Betty agreed with me that we needed some new landscaping," Harry explains, "the first thing I did was clear out our formal Italian garden. It had a lot of chipped statuary, and it gave me the

HOW TO USE A

How to use a feminine syringe (and when) is fully described in my 116-page, illustrated book given to anyone who buys a B. F. Goodrich rubber product at a drug store. I give other advice on feminine hygiene, too. This book formerly sold for $1. Buy a gravity-flow syringe like we use in the hospital, or a B. F. Goodrich "Sojourn" syringe or hot-water bottle, ice cap, etc. Send the folder packed with it to Dept. MS-4, The B. F. Goodrich Co., Akron, Ohio. Book will be mailed in plain envelope.

creeps. Instead of the garden, I built a pool and a brick terrace. Then, I removed the old-fashioned wooden benches that encircled some of the trees. I think those benches are why people used to mistake the place for a public park.

"When I got those down, I ordered some playground equipment for the girls and then put up a fence so that now anyone with half an eye can tell that this is a home and not a community project."

When you walk through the James' house, it's hard to believe that it once belonged to someone else. It so reflects the owners' taste that you imagine it was built on their order from the ground up.

Actually, it was Harry who found the house originally. Betty was working on Meet Me After The Show when a real estate agent phoned and asked Harry if he might be in the mood for a little house-hunting.

"Okay," Harry said, "I'll give it a try." That afternoon he plodded through an old 12-room house at the foot of the Hollywood Hills. The place seemed gloomy to him but he liked the wonderful oak panelling, the size of the rooms, and best of all, the price.

At dinner that night—all serious talks in the James family are conducted at the dinner table—Betty asked Harry for his report. "I saw a place this afternoon," Harry began, "that has the makings of a pretty nice estate. It's not at all like the modern jobs we've been looking at, but I think you really ought to take a look."

Betty took a look. "And my first impression," she recalls, "was that the place was a real horror. The outside of the house was painted dirty white over brick. There was a stained-glass skylight in the hall that gave the entrance a kind of Boris Karloff quality. The bathrooms were done in black. No kidding, with a ghastly touch of pink and orchid. There were seven fireplaces in the joint, but five were boarded up, and the two that were working had black marble fronts and rococco mantels. It looked a lot like Gloria Swanson's mansion in Sunset Boulevard. And yet, it was a well-built house, with good lines and a sound structure, and as Harry says, the price was right, so right that we bought it."

As soon as this piece of real estate passed into their hands, Betty and Harry called on their old reliable interior decorator, Paul Granard. Twice before, Paul had helped them furnish homes, and he knew all their quirks and preferences.

He knew that Betty prefers ottomans to easy chairs, red to any other color. He knew Harry's predilection for lots of clothes and closet space enough to hang them. He knew, too, that the entire James family loved horses and horsey objects. "And I knew most of all," he says, "that they liked to face a challenge. In redoing this house, they were certainly facing one."

FORTUNATELY, Betty and Harry are both extremely systematic. They organize well, and they know how to execute plans. They started their remodeling in orderly fashion. First project was the front hall.

Here, they knocked out the stained glass skylight and substituted frosted glass. They put in two large windows overlooking the backyard. The effect of these two simple changes was to flood the foyer with sunlight which brought out the rich wood tones of the old English panelling.

In the way of furniture, Paul Granard came up with a green leather bench, a hall mirror, and a matching leather-topped table. "That's all the furniture you need here," Granard said, and Betty agreed. Granard, however, has a habit of giving each of his clients a special little gift when his decorating job is finished. While Betty was working at the studio one day, he planted a double student lamp on the hall table. The lamp has one white and one red glass shade.

When it came to furnishing her new living room, Betty really had a job, because the room is so very large. Using normal size furniture, the room would have held so many pieces it would have resembled a hotel lobby. Realizing this, Betty asked Paul to design three over-scale couches and a coffee table eight feet square. This simple arrangement provides a lot of seating space.

Betty is a pretty utilitarian-minded girl, and she felt strongly that the living room should be used. Why not make it the television room? she asked herself. Next day she had Paul install the family television set in a natural wood cabinet and place the cabinet in the living room. Now as many as 50 or 60 people can gather there comfortably without feeling lost.

The Harry James' library, as you might expect, is not only for books, but is stacked with record albums and horse trophies. The two largest trophies were won by Betty's famous two-year-old "Big Noise." Betty and Harry bred and raised the colt on their ranch. Already he's won $60,000 for his owners.

The library's beauty stems from the contrast of bright modern fabrics and dark antique woodwork. Betty used as much of her favorite red in this room as Harry would stand. She ordered more ottomans than chairs, and when Harry suggested that she turn an under-the-stairs closet into a modest but adequate bar, she kissed him on the cheek and said, "Darling, you're really a frustrated decorator."

It was Betty, though, who pulled off a decorating coup in the dining room. "Let's have three tables in the dining room instead of one," she said. As a result, the two tavern tables along the walls and an English hunt table in front of the fireplace, can be easily combined to form a large horse-shoe table for very large dinners. Other times, Betty arranges a buffet supper on the hunt table, and the guests serve themselves and then sit down at the long tavern tables.

The color scheme in the room is again predominantly red with shades of green and white, and the scenic wall paper is actually a hand-blocked linen showing Derby Day at Churchill Downs.

Betty intended to have the bedroom done in red, too, but Harry put his foot down, so she compromised on raspberry. Paul Granard camouflaged the bed with a tailored spread and a dozen assorted pillows. Harry's first reaction to the pillows was that they looked like lollypops without sticks. "But if Betty's happy," he says, "that's all that counts."

And to make Harry happy, Betty had the attic converted into a dressing-room-study for him. Harry is up half the night when he's working, and during the day he likes a secluded corner of his own. The attic was his answer.

When she runs out of adjectives describing the beauty of her new home, Betty falls back on the essential rightness of the house for her type of family. She points out that it's only a step through her dressing room to the children's room. On work-day mornings, Betty slips quietly out of bed, showers, steps into her slacks, and leaves by way of the girls' room. This way she can take a loving look back at her sleeping daughters.

"Since we've been married," Betty says, "Harry and I have lived in three different houses. This one is the best, and because it is, it will probably be our last."

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Frank Sinatra had three children by his first wife. Will he and Ava have any more and does Ava ever see her step-children?—S. O., Baltimore, Md.

A. Ava would like at least two sons of her own, plans to see the step-children as frequently as the circumstances warrant.

Q. Is there a religious revival in Hollywood? Is that why there are so many biblical pictures?—Y. O., Denver, Col.

A. Hollywood tries to anticipate the public's taste. Apparently movie-goers like such films as David And Bathsheba and Samson And Delilah. The public dictates to Hollywood, never Hollywood to the public.

Q. Can you tell me how much Tyrone Power earns each week and whether he is standing in the way of his wife's acting career? —B. H., Boston, Mass.

A. Power's salary is $5,750 a week. He has no objections to Linda Christian's acting career. She has, in fact, recently signed to appear in a Columbia picture.

Q. Is it true that Greer Garson and Clark Gable dislike each other?
—A. L., Great Neck, N. Y.

A. Ever since Adventure their relationship has been polite but distant.

Q. What was Dinah Shore's real name before she came to Hollywood?
—G. F., Nashville, Tenn.

A. Fanny Rose.

Q. Is Rocky Cooper willing to divorce Gary now because she's found a suitor?
—B. U., Boston, Mass.

A. Since her estrangement from Gary, Mrs. Cooper has frequently been seen with Bob Six, airlines executive. Although she has no intention of marrying Six, she's willing to divorce Gary.

Q. I understand that the Corinne Calvet-Zsa Zsa Gabor fight is not a genuine feud but just another publicity stunt. What's the lowdown?
—D. R., Denver, Colo.

A. You're right. It's a publicity stunt.

Q. Was Annette Warren, who sang the songs for Ava Gardner in Show Boat, told to deny the fact? Where is she now? —D. N., New York, N. Y.

A. Miss Warren was never told to deny her off-screen role and has never denied it. She is currently playing the night club circuit.

Q. Is it true that Ingrid Bergman's ex, Dr. Peter Lindstrom, plans to marry Celeste Holm? —A. S., Chicago, Ill.

A. Miss Holm's divorce does not become final for another seven months. She has no plans for marriage within the next year, and regards Dr. Lindstrom as a friend.

Q. Isn't Peter Lawford an adopted son?

A. No.

Q. How much money do Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis make between them each week? —T. H., Merced, Cal.

A. When they're both working, $1,450 per week.

Q. What is the basis of the unpleasantness between Danny Kaye and Red Skelton? —Z. M., Tulsa, Okla.

A. Kaye allegedly refused to introduce Skelton to the audience when Red followed him at the London Palladium last year.

Q. Could you tell me who walked out on whom in the Stanwyck-Taylor affair? —M. B., Terre Haute, Ind.

A. Taylor on Stanwyck.

Q. I understand that Sid Luft, Judy Garland's heartbeat, was an ex-flame of Eleanor Powell. True?—M. N., N.Y.C.

A. The truth is that Miss Powell employed Luft as a private secretary for a short period, which may have given rise to romantic rumors.

Q. Is Deanna Durbin going to make a comeback opposite Mario Lanza? Is it true that Deanna weighs 155 pounds?
—E. W., Dallas, Tex.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

ARE ANN BLYTH-CHARLES FITZSIMMONS "THAT WAY" ABOUT EACH OTHER? . . . THE LOUIS B. MAYERS STAGE THE PARTY OF

NEW FIANCE Vittorio Gassman flew from Italy to Shelley Winters, who got to work arranging his divorce from his first wife.

NEW HUSBAND for Gloria Swanson may be former society columnist Brandy Brent. He'd be number six for ever-young Gloria.

THE BEGINNING OF A NEW ROMANCE? Steve Cochran and Ann McCrea make a cozy couple—but Steve's hard to catch!

THE END OF AN OLD ROMANCE? Are Kirk Douglas and Elizabeth Threatt through now that Gene Tierney's got her divorce?

CALL it a presentiment or something, but I just couldn't help calling Elizabeth Taylor before she planed out to London to marry Michael Wilding.

"Elizabeth, are you sure in your heart that you are doing the right thing?" I asked.

Her voice was steady and firm as she replied, "Of course, I am sure. I wouldn't think of taking such a serious step as marriage with Michael unless I was sure that I loved him very much. I'm surprised that you ask."

I said, "But you should be especially careful that you are right this time. You are so young and you have had one unhappy marriage."

"Believe me, I have thought it over carefully and I know in my heart that this marriage will stick," she hesitated a moment, then added, "—forever."

So, in spite of the way the fans feels about her marriage to the British actor 20 years her senior, that was that and nothing more to be said about it.

I switched the conversation over to a less dangerous subject and asked about her wedding outfit. "I'm wearing a gray suit which Helen Rose designed for me—very simple, and with it I'll wear a white hat." Very, very different from the magazine cover bride Liz was when she married Nicky Hilton.

Never let it be said that Elizabeth hasn't shown iron determination in making up her mind to wed Wilding. The marriage does not please her fans, his fans, her studio and many of her devoted friends.

And, she can't be superstitious because one of Hollywood's most patronized fortune tellers predicts the marriage hasn't "a chance."

CAN'T mention names—but this is too good to keep:

The eight-year-old son of a famous actor has been very much on his mother's side since the divorce of his parents. The other night the little boy was watching his mother dress for a formal party. As she showed her lovely gown for her son's approval, the kid suddenly said:

"You look beautiful, mother. Can you imagine that louse walking out on us?"

GENE KELLY RELIVES REEL-ROLE IN REAL-LIFE SWISS VISIT

Recovering from an appendectomy in Switzerland, Gene is surrounded by fans who want to sing and dance with him a la American In Paris.

THE MONTH . . . GENE TIERNEY DENIES ROMANCE WITH TED STAUFFER . . . GORDON MACRAE'S A HIT AT THE COCONUT GROVE

SUNDAY morning at the swank Racquet Club in Palm Springs:

The pink-and-white-striped umbrellas reflect in the blue swimming pool, the waiters stand around listlessly because there won't be much doing until noon.

The four tennis courts are busier with those who have had a less hectic Saturday night. Ginger Rogers and Greg Bautzer are playing —and winning—every set of mixed doubles they enter.

Kirk Douglas, his body deeply bronzed from the sun and his hair sun-streaked is one of the first on the swimming pool scene for breakfast. Kirk, who is stag over the week-end, stretches out in the sun and doesn't seem to mind that some tourists are surreptitiously snapping his picture.

Sy Bartlett, the writer and Kirk's pal, puts in an appearance. "Hi," says Sy.

"Low," says Kirk—and he isn't kiddin'.

A long table is beginning to fill up with guests elaborately arrayed in sports clothes—and I mean elaborately. Mrs. William Powell (the vivacious "Mousie") has on white shorts and a white sweater, the whole outfit embroidered in white pearls like a Sonja Henie skating outfit.

An eastern socialite at the same table wears a red linen "sports" dress with a red sweater covered with sequins. The tourists sort of gulp over our California "sports" styles.

The tables around the pool are crowded now and the waiters scurry around with bulging breakfast trays although it is now way after noon.

Linda Christian and Ty Power drop by to say "hello." They are houseguests of the Darryl Zanucks who have a lovely home in Palm Springs. Ty and his boss and two other men have been playing croquet until dawn.

Dinah Shore and George Montgomery (they've built a beautiful home in Palm Springs) show up for tennis and they're actually dressed for tennis—Dinah in a cute pair of white shorts and a short sleeved white blouse. George has a camera with him and takes pictures of the "movie stars" around the place.

The sunshine pours over the whole place, the day is warm and perfect—but at four o'clock in the afternoon I hadn't seen one person in the pool.

Oh, well—that's "sports life" and rugged outdoor living among our movie babes in Southern California.

I WASN'T taking anybody's word about how Debbie Reynolds feels about goodlooking Bob Wagner on account of these two young people are certainly getting around together and they've got "that look" in their eyes.

But Debbie just laughed when I cornered her and asked how serious her romance is. "We like each other fine, otherwise we wouldn't spend so much time together. That adds up, doesn't it?

"If you mean anything more serious—no! We both have a long way to go in our careers. Bob is just getting started at 20th and the same goes for me at MGM." (Being a star at 19 is hardly just getting started, Debbie.)

She went on, "Bob and I are not new friends. We've known each other a long time—oh, well over a year." (!)

Debbie said she would be 20 years old on April first and she's never been even remotely in love, no shivers up and down her spine, no thrills when the phone rings, not an hour of sleep lost over any male!

So wot's she doin'? "I'm taking tap dancing lessons and next month I have exams coming up to be a Girl Scout leader!"

And to think—Debbie is just the same age as that sparkling woman of the world, Liz Taylor!

CLOSE-UP of Doris Day: Her favorite foods: avocado, roast beef, French fried onions, baked potato with sour cream and chives and fried chicken—and she doesn't gain a pound. But now and then she gets "gastronomic conscience" and goes on the yogurt and blackstrap molasses routine . . . Deeply religious, but very quietly so, she says her prayers morning and night and frequently before she goes into a difficult scene . . . She doesn't drink, smoke or travel the nightclub circuit but she doesn't like this emphasized lest people think she is a prude . . . She would rather sing than anything in the world and she's a far better dancer than she gets credit for . . . It upset her greatly when stories were printed that she and Danny Thomas were "feuding" over honors in I'll See You In My Dreams. She and Danny sent each other letters and telegrams and flowers vowing affection and admiration and denying any knowledge of how the false rumor started . . . She considers herself one of the blessed because she is a completely happy person . . . She is definitely the "little woman" in her married life, Marty Melcher being very much the head of the house . . . She likes to play baseball and football with her ten-year-old son, Terry Jordan, born of her first marriage (to Al Jordan, trombonist with Jimmy Dorsey's band) . . . Her real name is Doris Kapplehoff and sometimes she signs notes to her husband and son as merely "Kapplehoff" . . . Her philosophy is—if your work is a struggle you're in the wrong business. "People drown who struggle too hard," says Doris.

FOR the third year the Louis B. Mayers gave a party honoring Ann and Henry Ford II and for gayety, beautifully gowned women and a unanimous good time it was, as usual, the best party of the year.

The Mayfair Room of the Beverly Wilshire Hotel was ablaze with red and white flowers and the mirror-walls were decorated with baby orchids.

Our table was particularly gay with Bob Hope and George Burns telling stories to such appreciative listeners as Irene Dunne (she, too, has a poodle hair cut, surprising because Irene seldom goes in for any kind of fad), Henry Ford, Mervyn Le Roy, Dinah Shore, Mrs. Alfred Vanderbilt and our charming hostess, Lorena.

It had been a long time since any of us had seen Greer Garson, she's such a busy belle in Texas these days. Greer looked wonderful with her red hair swept back from her face and tied at the nape of her neck—like a portrait from Godey's Lady Books.

Joan Bennett, who has attended few big parties since the shooting headlines, wore a stunning gown of hyacinth chiffon and looked unbelievably beautiful.

June Allyson in white, Esther Williams in pale pink, Gracie Allen in champagne chiffon under black lace, Ann Sheridan in black,

Are you in the know?

If you spy a sliver in the fricassee—

☐ Sound off ☐ Inform your squire

A delectable dish—till you eagle-eye a sliver (or whatever) in same. So . . . you tag the head waiter and sound off. Or do you? If you'd avoid disapproving glances, you'll quietly mention the snag to your date; let him arrange for a new serving. If you're glance-conscious at trying times, scoff off anxiety with Kotex: those flat pressed ends defy revealing outlines. And your new Kotex belt gives added comfort. Made with soft-stretch elastic; non-twisting, non-curling. Washable. Dries fast!

When a gal's "all ears," what's the cure?

☐ Clam up ☐ A forward look ☐ Drop earbobs

'Tisn't the snooper type we mean—(just wanted to keep you guessing). It's a gal with really outsize ears. The remedy? Ixnay on skinned-rabbit hairdo's. Cover ears with curls that turn softly forward. And for the softness you want and need in sanitary protection—count on Kotex. It holds its shape, keeps you comfortable. Made to stay soft while you wear it!

Which hotel plan should you choose?

☐ American ☐ European

Maybe the American plan (meals included) appeals to you. But mornings, would you rather sleep than yawn into the bacon n' eggs? Or prefer exploring new dining spots to dashing back for hotel chow? Then consider the European plan. When vacationing, being carefree's important, and on problem days let Kotex help—with the extra protection that special safety center assures you. Try all 3 absorbencies of Kotex.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Van and Evie Johnson drink in Greer Garson's words at the Damon Runyon dinner. Greer's been in Texas with hubby Buddy Fogelson.

Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks Jr. and Anne Baxter were all fashion plates.

But in the men's field—Georgie Jessel topped them all. He wore white tie and tails and his date was Marilyn Monroe in a bright red dress.

SHORT SHOTS: An eastern columnist printed Ava Gardner Sinatra was "expecting" in August. Ava says no one is sorrier than she and Frankie that it isn't true.

Gene Tierney called me from Mexico City to deny that she's the new love in Ted Stauffer's life now he's divorced from Hedy Lamarr. Gene took her own divorce from Oleg Cassini very hard.

Mitzi Gaynor has THE assignment of the year (that is, it will be so considered by belles who like to eat). She's been told to put on 20 pounds for The Girl Who Couldn't Help It at 20th—about a streamlined gal who gets fat while her best fella is in the army. But alack and alas, she has to get it all off again before the end of the picture.

I wish a good stylist would take over Marilyn Monroe's clothes problem. It's hard for a girl with that gorgeous figure to go so wrong on clothes—but Marilyn accomplishes it.

Rocky Cooper says she "offered" Gary Cooper a divorce six months ago and he asked her not to go through with it!

The best news of the month is the reconciliation between John Wayne and Esperanza. They were both miserable apart.

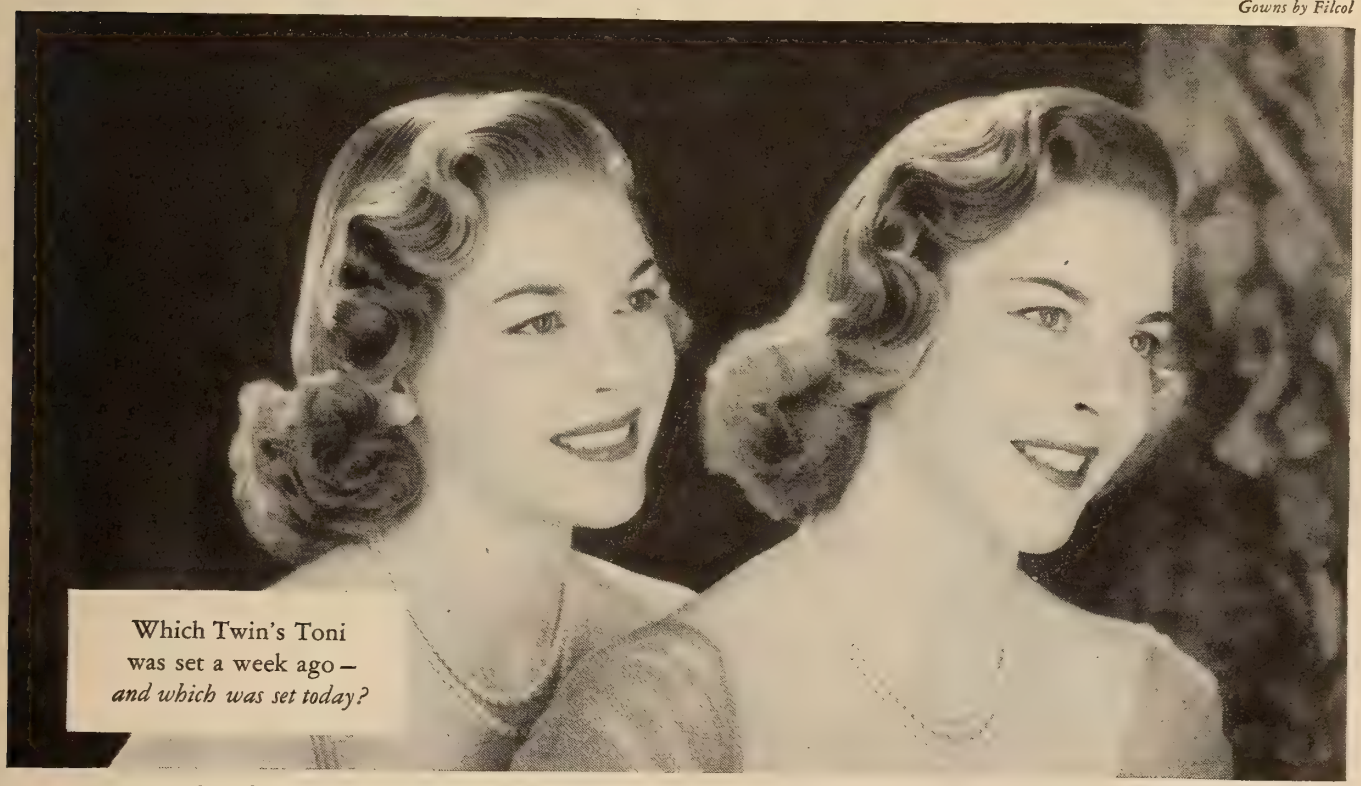
What a touching and sincerely beautiful thing Mercedes McCambridge said to me several says after the death of her baby. She and Fletcher Markle had hoped and prayed so much for the little boy who was born dead.

"God knows better about these things than we do," Mercedes said. "Fletcher and I have so many things to be grateful for; we have each other and my little son by a previous marriage, and good health and our work. These things we try to remember in our sorrow instead of asking 'Why?' "

GORDON MACRAE'S Coconut Grove debut was a wow—just as everyone expected the place was jammed with stars to welcome one of the most popular guys in our town. But what turned out to be a surprise (in a way) is that he broke all existing records at the place—even the high set by Tony Martin.

Sheila beamed as her husband sang, played the sax, told funny stories and gave imitations of Bing Crosby, Frank Sinatra and Frankie Laine, Sheila has (Continued on page 10)

NOW—the most fabulous permanent since home waves were introduced!



New Toni

WITH PRICELESS PINK LOTION

Never before—a wave so lovely! So lively! So lasting!
Holds the set longer than any other permanent!

Gowns by Filcol

Beverly Dahm, on the right, had her Toni set just before this picture was taken—Barbara, on the left, had her Toni set one week before and never re-set it! Proof that Priceless Pink lotion gives a wave that stays lovely without re-setting!

You'll forget all other ideas about permanents the first time you use New Toni with Priceless Pink lotion. For it gives a wave with the vibrant spring and silky-softness of a natural wave. And it holds the set longer than any other permanent.

Never a lotion so wonderful! New Priceless Pink lotion curls more completely—yet is kinder to your hair! And that means a lovelier, livelier wave for you. Less re-setting. New freedom from nightly chore of pin curls.

Never a neutralizer so fast! You save 20 minutes with the new Permafix method of neutralizing. And because Permafix neutralizes more thoroughly, it "locks in" your Toni wave so it can't come out.

Today have a Toni with New Priceless Pink lotion—and you'll forget your hair was ever straight.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Charlie Fitzsimmons (he's Maureen O'Hara's kid brother) extends a glad hand as Ann Blyth looks on. He's her most serious beau to date.

At their table were seated Jeff Chandler and his wife. Other guests of the MacRaes' were the Gene Nelsons, the Dean Martins and the Danny Thomases.

CAPERING with Cupid: Terry Moore and Johnny Ray living it up, walking on clouds, soooo crazy about each other for the whole week he was visiting in Hollywood. Need I remind you that Johnny is our new song stylist whose "Little White Cloud That Cried" is the No. 1 hit. Only it turned pink when he was with Terry.

Has Ann Blyth finally tumbled? She's dating regularly with Charles Fitzsimmons, 26-year-old brother of Maureen O'Hara, and a good looker if I ever saw one. He's taking a refresher course in law at UCLA and he has played in a movie or two. So far, Ann has paid more attention to him than to any other man in her young life.

Rock Hudson, who said "no more movie star romances" when he and Vera-Ellen parted, seems to mean it. His new girl is script-girl Betty Abbott, niece of Bud Abbott.

THE Letter Box: From Antwerp comes a blast from "Ann F" in very definite English: "We are sick to death of Elizabeth Taylor—tired of looking at her and hearing about her!"

Mrs. Emmett Lawrence of Liverpool, Ohio, wants Norma Shearer to know her fans want her back on the screen again. "No one since has equaled her loveliness and talent."

Marilyn Barnhause says Steve Cochran is Tops and wants to know how old he is. Steve's 27, Marilyn, isn't married and lives with his dog Tchaikowsky. You're welcome.

Pat Samuelson, who has met Yvonne De Carlo in person, wants other fans to know that "Yvonne is the very nicest to meet of all of them—not stuck up or standoffish at all."

If Mario Lanza is in dangerously poor health, I haven't heard about it, Joyce Walters. He has had to diet strenuously—but not dangerously.

G. F. Heinen says I neglect Cary Grant and Walter Pidgeon in this department. Good heavens, let me get busy about them both next month. They are favorites of mine, too.

Ann McKay, Philadelphia, thinks Dale Robertson is the greatest and the best of the he-men. But, she adds, "Burt Lancaster is delicious, too." Burt will cringe at that "delicious," Ann. Well, guess that's all. See you next month.

SPECIAL TO MODERN SCREEN: A NEW GOSSIP COLUMN

hollywood report

by Mike Connolly

famous columnist for The Hollywood Reporter

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Come closer and I'll tell you a secret. Farley Granger takes a trip to Europe this summer to forget all about Shelley Winters . . . You fans, through your mail, are showing a revived interest in Ingrid Bergman. Is it the new Rossellini bambino that's renewing your curiosity in this once most luminous of all Hollywood's stars? . . . The first big femme stars to go all-out for acting on television will be Loretta Young, Joan Crawford, Ginger Rogers, Barbara Stanwyck and Irene Dunne . . . His work in Viva Zapata! will mean even bigger and better roles for Marlon Brando. And in this picture—for once!—you can understand what Marlon's saying. He doesn't mumble as much as he used to . . . Warners would like to get Judy Garland to play the lead in The Helen Morgan Story, which will give out with the whole story of that tragic singer of the bathtub gin era.

Garland

It's my considered opinion that Donald O'Connor's great singing and dancing talents haven't even been scratched in either pictures or TV, and that includes his smash performance in Singin' In The Rain. The next few years should see Don established once and for all as one of the biggest stars in Hollywood . . . Watch for Frank Sinatra, Brenda Marshall Holden, Jane Wyman, Ann Rutherford and Mona Freeman to blossom out as artists. They slip into smocks once a week and meet at Paul Hesse's studio to paint under Paul Clemens' supervision . . . Incidentally, the planned Korean jaunt of Ava G. and Frankie was postponed at press time till summer. Frankie could stay in the Pacific only 12 days, and if the Army takes him it's gotta be for at least three weeks . . . Lana Turner's new seven-year contract at MGM will be the best ever handed an actress there. It calls for only two pictures a year, with 14 weeks' vacation between each film. Greg Bautzer bowed out as her attorney after eight months of negotiation on the contract.

O'Connor

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Liz Taylor made a down payment on a home here for herself and Mike Wilding before planing to London to marry him . . . Oddly enough, Liz attended a party thrown for the President of Mexico's son, Miguel Aleman, by an old flame, Stan Donen, shortly before she took off for her wedding! But it was "just friendly," to quote Liz herself . . . Up to Liz's leave-taking, MGM costumer designer Helen Rose was throwing together a gray gown with organdy trimmings for the breathless star's marriage, and on the Sunday she took off her mother, Mrs. Frances Taylor, spent all afternoon frying chicken for her daughter to nibble enroute to Los Angeles' International Airport . . . John Wayne's reconciliation with Esperanza involved a pink straw horse contributed by peacemaker Jimmy Henaghan . . . Dewey Martin, who'll emerge as a new star in support of Kirk Douglas in The Big Sky, married Margaret Ann Havelhurst, a San Francisco gal . . . Fernando Lamas helped Lana carve her birthday cake for the photogs . . . Well, the Lana-Lamas romance may be just a publicity gag, as they say in some quarters, but we've got a feeling Fernando really cared through it all.

Deanna Durbin is due back in Hollywood in September, after all these years. Producer Joe Pasternak has this to say about Deanna: "The fans never leave the stars—the stars leave the fans." And he's so right . . . Condolences to Mercedes McCambridge and Fletcher Markle, who lost their child . . . Betsy von Furstenberg and Nick Hilton have been a long-distance item.

ODDS BODKINS:

Pvt. Vic Damone wrote to Virginia Mayo from overseas, asking her to send him an autographed picture! Vic, whose friends in Flickerdom are many, must be quite the star with his GI buddies himself . . . In real life John Derek and Harry Lauter are best friends. In reel life they're playing best friends in Columbia's Prince Of Pirates . . . A new wedding chapel in Las Vegas is called The Hitching Post . . . MGM had an awful time this year deciding which of three supporting actor nominees to push for the Oscar. Three of them work for MGM: Gig Young, Leo Genn and Peter Ustinov . . . Wait'll you see the NEW Jan Sterling. Her resemblance to Lana Turner is amazing since she's had her nose altered . . . Biggest name-dropper in Hollywood is agent Henry Willson. By dropping 'em, I mean he's the guy who changed Roy Fitzgerald's name to Rock Hudson, Marilyn Louis to Rhonda Fleming, Francis Timothy McCowan to Rory Calhoun, Gail Shikles to Craig Stevens, Robert Moseley to Guy Madison, Arthur Gelien to Tab Hunter (here's a kid who'll be a big star soon!) and Charles Locher to Jon Hall.

Flashiest sight of the month: Van Johnson as emcee at Irene's fabulous star-modeled evening gown show was wearing a red vest, red wool sox and black velvet slippers embroidered with "V.J." in gold . . . Did you happen to see an old Monogram picture on TV called Ghosts On The Loose? It starred the East Side Kids, and AVA GARDNER was their leading lady! . . . Rita Lupino, Ida's actress sister, is studying law at Southwestern university . . . The weepiest double-bill of the year was shown here at the Valley Theatre: The Blue Veil and Bright Victory . . . WITH A SONG IN MY HEART

■ With A Song In My Heart salutes the impressive courage and talent of singer Jane Froman, whose injuries in a plane crash near Lisbon in 1943 nearly cost her her life, and threatened to rob her forever of a glittering career in show business. The saga of Miss Froman's comeback on the stage, her perseverance through 25 agonizing operations, her will to go on, are certainly an inspiration to all who know affliction. And this large-scale Technicolor musical pays her homage with taste and skill. With A Song In My Heart uses The Jolson Story technique—that is, Susan Hayward plays Jane Froman, but whenever Susan opens her mouth to sing the voice that comes out is actually Miss Froman's. It works fine, since the synchronization is expert and Miss Hayward has just the right sultry, torchy look that goes with Miss Froman's sultry, torchy singing voice. There are 30 topnotch tunes that Miss Froman has sung during the last 15 years, there are David Wayne and Rory Calhoun to help greatly as the men in Jane Froman's life, and there is Thelma Ritter to lighten the movie's sadder moments with her tough, refreshingly hard-boiled humor. All these should make With A Song In My Heart a very popular movie.
Cast: Susan Hayward, Rory Calhoun, David Wayne, Thelma Ritter.—20th Century-Fox.

THE PRIDE OF ST. LOUIS

For the kids who play ball in a backlot, for the fans who crowd the ball parks, for all America that loves and follows baseball, The Pride Of St. Louis is the movie to see. This is the lively saga of Jerome Herman Dean—also known as Dizzy Dean—who started out pitching barefoot in the Ozarks and rose to glory as one of baseball's most colorful and dazzling hurlers. The movie concentrates on the few years when Dizzy made history for St. Louis, his sad decline when his pitching arm went bad, and his climb to fame as a radio sports announcer. At the age of ten Dizzy was picking four or five hundred pounds of cotton a day. He made his way working hard, talking fast, and demonstrating tremendous confidence in himself. This confidence, The Pride Of St. Louis does not hesitate to point out, bordered on egotism. "Ya pitched a great game," someone says to Dizzy in the movie. "Yeah, I did, didn't I?" Dizzy replies. Dizzy's virtues and his weaknesses are unfolded here. Dan Dailey is perfectly cast as Diz—tall, gabby, jovial, and sometimes childlike. And Joanne Dru is helpful as the wife who tries to make Dizzy settle down to the realities of his up-and-down career. The Pride Of St. Louis has a natural in Dizzy Dean, his story, and baseball itself.
Cast: Dan Dailey, Joanne Dru, Richard Hylton, Richard Crenna.—20th Century-Fox.

LOVE IS BETTER THAN EVER

Since this is leap year, MGM has come up with a delightful, delicious leap-year love story—of a nice girl's determined efforts to hook a boy who is just as determined not to get hooked. Since the girl is Elizabeth Taylor, you may wonder how Larry Parks can resist her, but he is a slightly tough Broadway character. "Not the type for marriage," laments Liz, a dancing school teacher in New Haven, Conn., to her dad. "Every man thinks he's not the type," replies Dad. And from there on Liz—with a slight assist from Dad—puts on a romantic campaign that proves a little dancing teacher from New Haven can outsmart a hep bachelor from New York every time. Love Is Better Than Ever is fun because Liz, Parks, the writer and director all bring a fresh, youthful enthusiasm to their work that is wholly contagious.. Not the least of the gayety in Love Is Better Than Ever comes from Liz's small dancing school in New Haven, where eager parents bring their kiddies, determined to make Eleanor Powells or Pavlovas out of the little dears. The annual show which the tots put on for their proud parents—a wonderfully amateurish, costumed pageant—is altogether hilarious. "I'm a grape," one tiny boy whispers solemnly to Larry Parks backstage. "I'm happy for you," whispers Parks just as solemnly.
Cast: Larry Parks, Elizabeth Taylor, Tom Tully, Josephine Hutchinson.—MGM.

NAVAJO

Navajo is a fresh and charming folk tale of a little Indian boy's love and pride in his land, his ancestors and his traditions. Produced for what Hollywood would call peanuts—$100,000—Navajo is far more likely to appeal to movie audiences, especially children, than many costly epics we could name. For it relies on a straightforward, lifelike story, on the breathtaking cliffs and mountains and plains of the Southwest, where the Navajo people dwell today on a reservation, and on the appealing face of Francis Kee Teller, a Navajo lad who is no more than eight years old. Francis, who has never acted before, plays a child who wants to live today just as his ancestors lived. He resents bitterly the school the U. S. government maintains on the reservation, since it will teach him the white man's ways and draw him away from old Indian beliefs and rituals. When he is sent to the school, Francis runs away and hides in the cliffs, where Navajo comes to a striking and touching conclusion. Around Francis Navajo weaves the folklore and magic of the Indian and altogether proves as fresh and different from most movies as a diamond is from a rhinestone. Navajo is a small diamond, but it is pure.

Cast: Francis Kee Teller, John Mitchell.—Lippert.

RANCHO NOTORIOUS

Rancho Notorious wants to be a Western—at the same that it wants to poke fun at Westerns. It turns out to be not a very good Western or a very good joke. Especially in its strange casting does the movie hurt itself. For it asks Mel Ferrer, one of the most soulful, ascetic and intellectual looking of our younger actors, to be a dangerous, hard-bitten desperado, Frenchy Fairmont, the fastest draw in the old West. And it asks Arthur Kennedy, another serious actor, to be the bold, daring, fist-fighting Western hero, out to find—and kill—the varmint who slew his sweet, innocent fiancée. By now we have all gotten used to seeing glamorous, continental Marlene Dietrich in Westerns, but you may find it difficult to accept her as the sweetheart of young Ferrer. As the proprietor of a secret ranch where outlaws may hide from the sheriff, Marlene wears some of the most uncommonly gorgeous gowns ever seen in old Texas, sings several throaty songs, and gradually falls out of love with Ferrer and into love with Kennedy. Aiming at something unusual, Rancho Notorious has achieved only something a little foolish.

Cast: Marlene Dietrich, Arthur Kennedy, Mel Ferrer.—RKO.

FIVE FINGERS

Five Fingers is perhaps the most startling and unique spy story to come out of Hollywood—and it becomes all the more startling when one realizes it is quite, quite true. During World War II—it can now be told—a highly trusted valet in the British Embassy in Ankara, Turkey, made himself more than one million dollars by handing over to the Nazis nearly every secret that was locked away in the Embassy safe, even including plans for the opening of a second front in Europe. With James Mason acting the valet, Fox relates this adventure in treachery in one of the most engrossing, original and suspenseful thrillers to reach the screen. Director Joseph L. Mankiewicz has wisely shot much of the movie right in Ankara and Istanbul and has captured the cynical world of espionage in all its cleverness, loathsomeness and sordidness. Mason gives the outstanding performance of his Hollywood career as the valet turned spy. Beautiful Danielle Darrieux is equally fascinating—and repellent—as a Polish countess left penniless by the war and willing to sell herself to any side just to be able to live again the luxurious life she had once known. Michael Rennie comes in effectively as a British agent pursuing Mason across Turkey.

Cast: James Mason, Danielle Darrieux, Michael Rennie.—20th Century-Fox.

PAULA

Somewhere in Paula there is a genuine human problem, however it is very nearly buried. The movie follows Loretta Young, as Paula, through a real and recognizable misfortune—the loss of her infant at birth, and the discovery that she can never bear children again. However, instead of probing honestly the emotions of Paula and her professor husband, Kent Smith, it nose-dives into implausible melodrama. Paula gets involved in a hit-and-run auto accident and is haunted by the fear that she'll be sent to prison, ruining her husband's chances to become dean of the college. The way in which the accident occurs and the way in which Miss Young's worries mount are completely lacking in credibility. But Paula does strike one interesting, reasonably authentic note: For Miss Young adopts the orphan boy struck down by her car, and since the boy has been deprived of the power of speech by the accident, she herself gives him necessary therapy. These detailed, scientific lessons in speech for the handicapped child lend some force to Paula, but otherwise it's full of false notes.
Cast: Loretta Young, Kent Smith, Alexander Knox, Tommy Rettig.—Columbia.

MY SIX CONVICTS

What makes men criminals? What brings them to the failure and frustration of a prison cell? Can anything be done for them in prison to make them better men? In this very sensitive, moving and humane story, a young psychologist goes to work in a big prison occupied primarily by hardened criminals, hoping to help these men. Derived from Donald Powell Wilson's powerful book of his own experiences as prison psychologist at Fort Leavenworth, the movie fills you with compassion. It is a realistic and sound drama which argues that many prisoners can be—deserve to be—guided back towards social responsibility. The psychologist in the movie, acted with extraordinary conviction by John Beal, enlists the aid of six convicts in conducting his experiments at the prison and through the tough, skeptical personalities of these six, the movie generates rowdy humor as well as piercing drama. Millard Mitchell, Gilbert Roland, Marshall Thompson, Alf Kjellin, Henry Morgan and Jay Adler are all superb as the convicts, and there is a desperate and frightening jailbreak to bring My Six Convicts to an embattled climax. But the break is less important than the notion you get from My Six Convicts that a man, even in prison, is a human being.
Cast: Millard Mitchell, Gilbert Roland, John Beal, Marshall Thompson.—Columbia.

A beaming, bright-eyed Judy, looking thinner and happier than she has in years, hangs on to every word her guy, Sid Luft, sends in her direction.

"A woman needs a man to protect her and love her," says Judy. And it looks as if she's found him—at long last.

BY JOAN KING FLYNN

"someone to watch over me"

■ For Judy Garland, the past few years have been filled with frustrations and unhappiness, but the nightmare was blotted out by the cheers and bravos of a tear-swept audience one April night last year at the Palladium. In the wings, the man she loved stood proudly by. The presence of Sid Luft made her happiness complete.

He was standing by her side again a few weeks ago on Judy's closing night at the Palace theatre. In her dressing room, in one of her rare interviews, the twice-divorced star told this writer why she had chosen Sid Luft to be her husband.

"Any woman who's a real woman wants a man to protect her and love her," she said. "That's what Sid does for me. We have accomplished so much together."

The facts are there to prove it.

Directly over her brown head, as she spoke, was a new but permanent fixture on the wall, a gleaming, gold plaque which read:

"This was the dressing room of JUDY GARLAND who set the all-time long run record Oct. 16th, 1951, to Feb. 24th, 1952, RKO PALACE THEATRE." (Continued on page 88)

new faces

Here are some of the screen's most promising newcomers. Remember their faces—they're going places!

MARGE AND GOWER CHAMPION go halves on everything: their work, their marriage, even their hobbies—collecting records and cats. But it's as a dance team that they're double dynamite! (They lit up the screen in Mr. Music and Show Boat.) New to Hollywood, but not to dancing, they both learned how at Marge's father's dancing school, where Gower's mother enrolled him as a child. Marge and Gower became good friends, but waited till they grew up to form a partnership in business and marriage. The merger occurred in 1947, after Gower was released from the U. S. Coast Guard. (While in service, incidentally, Gower toured with the Coast Guard's musical revue, Tars And Spars.) Shortly afterwards, they made their professional debut in a New York nightclub. A cinch for success, nightclub engagements piled up, and in between shows, they worked on the choreography of several Broadway hits. Credit them for the sparkling dance numbers in Lend An Ear, Small Wonder, and Make A Wish. It was while they were appearing at the Mocambo that an MGM talent scout snared them for Hollywood. They were such an amazing success in Mr. Music, their first film, they were immediately cast as Frank and Ellie, in Show Boat, where they delighted their fans. Watch for the Champions in Lovely To Look At, and Everything I Have Is Yours.

SUSAN CABOT's beginning to feel like a one-woman branch of the United Nations. She was a Samoan native in On The Isle Of Samoa, a Sioux Indian girl in Tomahawk, a gypsy dancer in Flame Of Araby, an Apache Indian in Battle At Apache Pass. And now, she'll play a Persian maid in her next film, Son Of Ali-Baba. But Susan, who was spotted by a talent scout while acting in a television show, isn't complaining—even though she does say, rather wistfully, that her big ambition is to portray a typical American girl, complete with saddle shoes, ice cream soda, and freckled-faced boy friend.

ALDO RAY had no intentions of breaking into the movies. He was quite content as the peace officer of Crockett, California. But one day, his brother Guido, having no car of his own, asked Aldo to drive him to an interview for an acting job. When they got there, the studio man took one look at Aldo, and bingo—he had a contract. (Aldo's disappointed brother was tagged as "not the movie type.") A natural comedian, Aldo showed his stuff so well in Saturday's Hero that he was grabbed for The Barefoot Mailman, and My True Story. And, to top it all, he's co-star of The Marrying Kind, opposite Judy Holliday.

KEVIN McCARTHY finally has a job he likes! When he was working his way through college, he tried chauffeuring for an elderly lady, sold fireworks, clerked in department stores, but nothing satisfied him. Then he got a part in a school play. Acting, he decided on that opening night, was it. In no time at all he'd chucked school, determined to carve himself a place in the acting world. He came to New York where persistence won him a part in the stock company of Brother Rat. He made such a memorable impression on London audiences as Biff in Death Of a Salesman that he was tapped for the movie role.

ANNE FRANCIS was only six months old when she became a "cover girl." Her blonde, blue-eyed charm sold magazines like magic. As soon as she could toddle, she modeled dresses, and when she started to talk it was on radio programs. Pretty soon she was on television in New York—which quite naturally led to a movie contract in Hollywood. But for a whole year Anne did nothing but gather dust on the studio shelf. Finally, Hollywood got smart, cast her in So Young, So Bad, and she was on her way. Soon you'll see this beauty in Lydia Bailey. She'll be Lydia —and, chances are, a star.

Rose Point sterling in the mood of romance

A legend of love in silver—Wallace's Rose Point!

It was inspired by the wedding veil of queens, the legendary Rose Point Lace. Centuries ago, a Venetian nobleman found in his gardens a full-blown rose, enshrined in a delicately spun web. He challenged his finest lace-makers to duplicate it and Rose Point Lace was born—a wedding veil for his bride.

In Wallace's Rose Point the full-blown rose, surrounded by silver pearls is sculptured in sterling by famed William S. Warren in exclusive "Third Dimension Beauty." Like every Wallace "Third Dimension Beauty" pattern it is a masterpiece—beautifully formed not only in front, but in profile and back—giving you sterling perfection from every possible view.

Six piece place setting, Rose Point, $32.50. Settings of other patterns from $32.50 to $43.50—all prices include Federal Tax.

Read the exciting design stories of each Wallace pattern in the 32-page book "Treasures in Sterling." It also contains many helpful table-setting ideas. Write (send 10c to cover postage) to Wallace Silversmiths, Department 94, Wallingford, Conn.

FROM THE MOVIES

AARON SLICK FROM PUNKIN CRICK—Marshmallow Moon by the Four Knights (Capitol). Album of Songs by Dinah Shore and Robert Merrill* (Victor).
Dinah co-stars in the film with Robert Merrill. Her record of Life Is A Beautiful Thing and Why Should I Believe In Love is available separately, as are Merrill's Still Water and My Beloved.

BELLE OF NEW YORK—Oops! by Louis Armstrong & Ella Fitzgerald (Decca); Margaret Whiting* (Capitol); Doris Day* (Columbia). Baby Doll by Gordon MacRae* (Capitol); Doris Day* (Columbia).
Hard to choose between the three leading versions of Oops!, a clever novelty song by Johnny Mercer and Harry Warren. We'll take Louis and Ella—they've never sounded better together.

KATHRYN GRAYSON—Kathryn Grayson sings* (MGM).
Grayson fans will be delighted by this collection. Her famous treatment of Jalousie is included, as well as Romberg's Lover Come Back To Me, Kern's Yesterdays, Berlin's Always and two film favorites, Love Is Where You Find It and All Of A Sudden My Heart Sings.

POPULAR

TONY BENNETT—*Silly Dreamer (Columbia).
Not a great tune, but anything Tony does nowadays is bound to be a hit, and chances are you'll like this one.

ALAN DEAN—*Since My Love Has Gone (MGM).
The young British singing sensation does a terrific job with this adaptation of a Traviata melody by Verdi. There's a great tune on the other side, too—If You Go, imported from France. Leroy Holmes' orchestra gives Alan sterling support.

BILLY ECKSTINE-SARAH VAUGHAN — *I Love You (MGM)
The Cole Porter song, and an old ballad called Ev'ry Day, are both excellent duet vehicles for two of the most artistic of all present-day ballad singers.

JOHNNIE RAY—*Please Mr. Sun (Columbia).
Here's a youngster with the most original new vocal style since Frankie Laine. Whether you find him weird or wonderful (or both), you've got to admit he's different. The same tune is done in more conventional style by Perry Como (Victor) and Tommy Edwards (MGM).

JAZZ

LIONEL HAMPTON—LP record* (Victor).
A worthy addition to Victor's Treasury of Immortal Performances, featuring some of the all-star recording bands Lionel used to assemble with such men as Harry James, Johnny Hodges, Benny Carter.

WOODY HERMAN—*Blue Flame (MGM).
A new version of Woody's old theme song, coupled with New Golden Wedding; Sonny Igoe on drums.

A. Deanna will be starred opposite Lanza at MGM sometime this spring. She weighs 124 pounds.

Q. Why won't Betty Grable play any straight dramatic parts? Why is she always in musicals?
—G. G., Hartford, Conn.

A. Betty Grable insists that she is a song and dance girl.

Q. I've been told that Bob Hope's wife, Dolores, is the most devout Catholic in the entire movie colony, and that one of Bob's four adopted children wants to become a nun. True or false?
—D. O., Canton, Ohio.

A. Dolores Hope is extremely religious. None of her children have yet made up their minds about future occupations.

Q. Whatever happened to Alan Young's two children from his first marriage?
—C. F., Seattle, Wash.

A. They live with their mother in Seattle, spend summer vacations with Alan in Hollywood.

Q. Doesn't Mario Lanza wear lifts in his shoes? —B. B., Philadelphia, Pa.

A. Yes.

Q. Why did Lana drop Greg Bautzer as her lawyer after he arranged for her new contract at MGM in January?
—T. U., San Francisco, Cal.

A. Lana wanted more speed in her property settlement with Bob Topping. She is still on the most friendly terms with Bautzer, although her present attorney is Neil McCarthy.

Q. Isn't it a fact that Howard Keel and Betty Hutton can't stand the sight of each other? —N. T., Reno, Nev.

A. They don't belong to a mutual admiration society but both have pretty well forgotten the tensions that went into making Annie Get Your Gun.

Q. Which movie actor receives the most fan mail? —C. G., Chicago, Ill.

A. It varies from month to month. At this writing, Roy Rogers and Dale Robertson lead the field.

Q. I have a bet with my buddies that the almost nude dame on my calendar is Marilyn Monroe. Did she ever pose for calendar art? If so, when?
—E. Y., San Antonio, Texas

A. Your bet's good. Marilyn Monroe posed for calendar art six years ago.

Q. When Carole Lombard died she left an estate of almost a million dollars. To whom was it left?
—S. A., Santa Fe, N. M.

A. Her husband, Clark Gable.

Q. Why was Phyllis Kirk dropped from MGM, then dropped from the cast of the Broadway hit, Point of No Return?
—B. O., Boston, Mass.

A. The studio had no parts for her; she was too inexperienced and miscast for the Broadway lead.

Q. Whatever happened to George Raft?
—N. B., Detroit, Mich.

A. He is filming a series of television pictures in which he plays a detective.

Q. I've been told that Donald O'Connor is currently the hottest young actor in Hollywood. How come?
—U. B., Toronto, Can.

A. O'Connor is absolutely sensational in Singin' in the Rain, especially in dance routines with Gene Kelly. Belatedly, he is being recognized as one of the most versatile talents in the business.

Q. I read in a newspaper column that Glenn Ford and Rita Hayworth fought all through the making of Affair In Trinidad. What really happened between these two?
—A. S., Brooklyn, N. Y.

A. There was no fighting at all. Ford and Hayworth are good friends.

Q. Hasn't Debbie Reynolds' popularity declined? Isn't that really why MGM removed her from the lead in Fearless Fagan? —J. F., Louisville, Ky.

A. Debbie was removed from the picture because producer Eddie Knopf decided she wasn't right for the part. Her popularity is at its highest point.

Q. Who is the highest paid songwriter in Hollywood, and how much does he earn?—A. H., St. Louis, Mo.

A. Irving Berlin. His income varies from $150,000 to $750,000 per year.

Q. Why doesn't Montgomery Clift make more pictures than he does?
—I. G., Evanston, Ill.

A. He is extremely particular about getting the right story.

Q. What is the general opinion of Marlon Brando in Hollywood?
—E. V., Des Moines, Iowa

A. He is generally considered a little eccentric but very talented.

Q. Why hasn't Lauren Bacall worked in movies lately? Won't any studio give her a job?
—V. O., Baltimore, Md.

A. Miss Bacall, married to Humphrey Bogart, is expecting her second child.

Q. What is Doris Day's name, her right age? How many times has she been married? How many children does she have? —G. G., Akron, Ohio

A. Doris Kappelhoff, age 27, married three times, mother of one son.

Marty helped Doris buy the house, then he moved in. That was a year ago, and now everything's changed—except their love.

BY JIM BURTON

■ For Doris Day and her tall, dark, handsome businessman husband, love is a private affair. They are very much like that young couple down the block from you. When the wedding bells have been stilled, the rice all swept up, the corsages of the bridesmaids wilted and the bride and groom are back to reality—that's when the year really starts. That first year together. That year when the newlyweds try to make their adjustments with dozens of admiring friends happily trying to watch their every move. Sooner or later, the newlyweds find they have to close the door and be alone together.

That's not too difficult for the average couple to do, if one or the other is not in the acting business. Take Doris Day, for instance. During her first year of marriage, she has had to engage in no end of strenuous picture work while creating, at the same time, a happy (Continued on page 89)

AVA FIGHTS BACK

For months she's been taking everything the critics can hand out. Now Mrs. Frank Sinatra is in there slugging to win back the public and to save her marriage.

BY CAROLINE BROOKS

No matter what your problem is nowadays, blame it on Frankie and Ava, and you're bound to feel better. This may seem a little far-fetched, but it isn't, because lately the Frank Sinatras have become something of a national scapegoat. Kicking them around seems to bring the same kind of release that pounding on a punching bag does when you're angry.

Ever since Frank got sore in Mexico last summer and told reporters, "I don't have to talk to anyone. It wasn't the press who made me famous; it was my singing and the American public," he has become the victim of a vicious campaign. People who once professed to be his friends are knifing him behind his back, or making blatantly cruel criticisms of him and his bride to the world.

Even before their marriage, the bricks began to fly. "Artie Shaw didn't send Ava to a psychiatrist for nothing," said one "wit" when Ava announced she'd be the new Mrs. Sinatra. "She may not be smart," another cat meowed, "but you have to give her credit for courage."

No matter where they go or what they do, the Sinatras are ridiculed, for no logical reason—except maybe that they fell in love, got married and are trying to make it work, and less fortunate people are jealous.

A few weeks ago, Ava and Frank made applications with the army to entertain the troops in Korea. They wanted to do their bit, the way other stars have, but what happened? Some wise guy loafing at a cafe table picked up the news and said, "Get this. The Sinatras are going to Korea. Don't they know the soldiers would rather see Mickey Mouse?" (Continued on page 104)

SPECIAL TO MODERN SCREEN:

With the wedding bells still echoing, the experts are saying it won't last. Can Liz be happy with a man twice her age? Liz and Mike think so.

HER LIFE'S COMPANION?

MEETING AT LONDON AIRPORT, a windblown Liz (note diamond and emerald engagement ring) fell into the waiting arms of Michael Wilding. Liz had left New York incognito as "Virginia Courtney", misleading the press, but Wilding was informed. He and Liz drove off in his Jaguar with three trunks and nine suitcases.

ARRIVING AT CAXTON HALL for the wedding on Feb. 21st, Liz appeared the more composed of the two. She wore a grey woolen suit with a stiff, organdie collar. The ten-minute civil ceremony was witnessed by about 14 friends. Herbert Wilcox (over Mike's shoulder) and his wife, actress Anna Neagle, were the attendants.

A friendly mob of 3,000 waited outside the registry office for the newlyweds (under marquee). Liz blew kisses as they drove away.

BY SUSAN TRENT AND HOLCOMB SMITH

■ On February 21, 1952, Elizabeth Taylor stood in the registry office at Caxton Hall, London, and became a bride for the second time. With an expression of radiant happiness on her face, she held out her left hand to 40-year-old Michael Wilding who slipped a plain gold band on her third finger. The ceremony lasted ten minutes. Then, propelling Liz lightly by the elbow, Mr. Wilding headed her into a mob of 3,000 Londoners who had massed outside the building.

"Hya Liz!" shouted her fans, pressing closer. "Are you happy?"

"Yes, yes, very happy," Liz replied, laughingly, waving and smiling to those near her.

As she approached the waiting limousine, a husky bobby swept her up in his arms and carried her to it while her husband trailed behind. Seemingly delighted by the flurry and excitement, Liz's parting (Continued on page 74)

The happy couple flew from London to Paris en route to a ten-day honeymoon in the French Alps. Liz was wearing the plain gold band Mike bought at Cartier's.

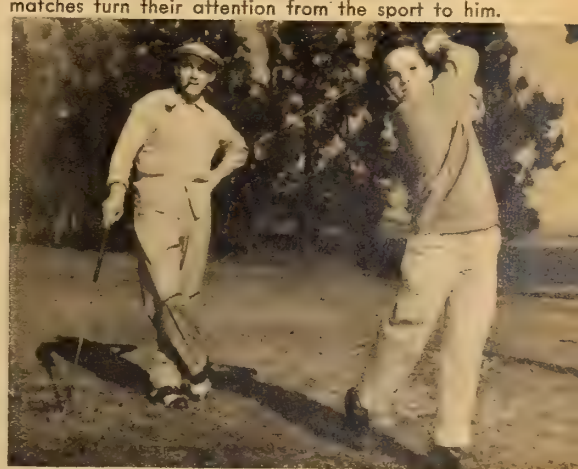
how casual can he get?

Is he saint or sinner? A human dynamo or the laziest guy in the world? Come meet the real Mr. Crosby, the man nobody knows . . .

BY KATHERINE ALBERT

■ You can hear anything you want to hear about Bing Crosby. Down-at-the-heel song-pluggers won't even mention his name (because even if Bing tried to sing half of the songs these pluggers wanted him to he wouldn't be through till he was 20,000 years old). But ask the Boys Club of America for their opinion of him and it's too corny to print. (When Bing does a benefit every penny goes to the charity.)

People call him saint, and they call him sinner. They say he's a dynamo and they point him out as the laziest man in the world. But the adjective everyone applies most often is casual. Casual— the word was made for Crosby.



But just how casual can a man be and stay one of the top singers and top money-makers in the country? There's something about Bing that nobody knows, some quality you can't define that is the real key to his character. He won't help you define it; he doesn't like to talk about himself. You can only observe him and analyze his actions, and maybe reach some sort of conclusion.

One of Bing's traits is his difficulty in realizing that what may be unimportant to him may be very important to someone else. He is bored and embarrassed by big accolades, large dinner parties. Whenever he receives an award he tries to duck out on the public celebration. But he's delighted when someone says to him, "I enjoyed your last picture, Bing," or, "I never miss your radio shows. They're always good." He is not, as he has been called, a "fundamentally shy guy." He talks easily and pleasantly to everybody. But he hates a display. And since he hates it, he can't understand why it might be important to someone else.

Which brings us to the one and only time Bob Hope was ever offended by Bing. All the insults that generally fly back and forth, are for fun (and the benefit of the box office). But Bob was sincerely hurt when a testimonial dinner was given in his honor by the Friars Club and Bing didn't show up. The dinner meant (Continued on page 105)

Bing dislikes crowds, always becomes tense and ill-at-ease when spectators at football games or golf matches turn their attention from the sport to him.

One of the few chances he gets to relax and be his own, genial self comes when he golfs with Lindsay (shown above) or one of his three other young sons.

you're Wrong about Jane Russell!

She's Hollywood's prize paradox—sultry siren or happy housewife, rowdy or religious. You've heard a lot of rumors, now here's the truth . . .

BY JIM HENAGHAN

■ Not very long ago a typically "hot" Hollywood story came winging out of Las Vegas, Nevada, from the scene of RKO's premiere for The Las Vegas Story. More than 100 members of the Hollywood press were in town at the time, partying at the studio's expense, so the story was well covered. However, it was one of the most provocatively confused tales to ever hit the front pages.

The fact was that Jane Russell had a black eye. But beyond that no one seemed sure of anything. One group of reporters held that Jane's husband, Bob Waterfield, had belted her in a moment of masculine pique. Another, that Waterfield had aimed a tender caress at comedian Ben Blue and Mrs. Waterfield got in the way. And the loudest and mostest scribblers howled that Jane had been downed by a Cadillac door in a high wind.

How Jane Russell got the mouse is, actually, of no consequence—and it is, by now, ancient history. The point is that 100 reporters covering the same story ran about like pigeons in a panic frantically trying to get the low-down when it was there for the simple asking. All they had to do was ask Jane Russell. She'd have told them—for sure.

This exhibition is a fair example of what the press boys and girls have been doing with Jane Russell ever since the day she was photographed in a hay barn for a scene in The Outlaw. They have been describing her, analyzing her and misquoting her until today—if you have read all of these canards religiously—you are a graduate (Continued on page 102)

IS INGRID UNHAPPY AND HOMESICK? HERE IS A REVEALING GLIMPSE OF HER LIFE IN ITALY.

Behind Bergman's Closed Doors

by Hedda Hopper

■ Grahame Green, author of "The End of the Affair," called on me in my Beverly Hills home when he was enroute from Saipan to England, and told me that Ingrid Bergman was his choice to star with Gregory Peck in the film version of his book. He has sold the rights to producer David Lewis, and the picture will be made in England this September.

If you haven't read the story—one that's going to be very difficult to put on the screen—it's about a woman who, through an adulterous affair, reaches sainthood after suffering the emotional tortures of the damned. Said Green to me, "Ingrid is the perfect actress for the part. She even looks like the character, though I certainly didn't have her in mind when I wrote it." And David Lewis, who was present, said, "Why didn't I think of her? The one I saw in the part was Jean Simmons."

"No," said Green, "she looks too young and inexperienced. Ingrid, whom I saw in London last year, is more beautiful than ever. There's a new zest for living in the expression on her face. Her body's slimmed down like a race horse, and with those luminous eyes of her, she can look like a saint."

After the author and David Lewis had gone, I called Ingrid on the overseas telephone in Rome. She was much easier to reach than when she lived a block away from me in Beverly Hills. She returned my call immediately. This time there was no press agent standing in her way, and I listened to the voice of a woman bubbling over with happiness six thousand miles from Hollywood. She was the same friendly Ingrid that I had known of old. She hesitated (Continued on page 95)

She gets full "star treatment" in Italy, and enjoys it. No longer hiding from the public, Ingrid recently attended the ballet in Milan, met the troupe's stars.

Rumor to the contrary, Ingrid is still deeply in love with Rossellini, and very much "at home" in Italy, where she has more fun than she did in Hollywood.

Ingrid's face is a mirror of her present happiness. Those who've seen her recently say she has become more beautiful than ever.

Ingrid celebrated Roberto's 42nd birthday with a small party. She feels so secure in his presence it's doubtful if she'll ever want to work for another director.

Reconciled to the fact that Pia is permanently separated from her, Ingrid lavishes much affection on her son, and hopes for another daughter in June.

BACHELOR MICHAEL O'SHEA BOUGHT A HOUSE FOR HIS FOUR-LEGGED LOVE. THEN HE MARRIED VIRGINIA

a house for a horse

by Marva Peterson

Mike describes himself as "a boy from Brooklyn who always wanted to be a cowboy." He dotes on his tack room with its smell of horses and leather, has one of the best paddocks in the San Fernando Valley.

The O'Sheas knocked down walls to make one large beamed living room. They furnished it unpretentiously with emphasis on comfort.

MAYO WHO MOVED IN AND FINALLY MANAGED TO PUT EVERYTHING, INCLUDING THE HORSE, IN ITS PLACE.

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

Virginia remodelled the dining room by adding a fireplace, cupboards and panelling as well as her favorite Van Gogh print. Large and uncluttered, the room is ideal for parties.

While he was away on location in Arizona, Virginia decorated Mike's bedroom. He came back to find she'd gone Western with heavy oak furniture, Navajo rugs and bold red wallpaper. Suits the would-be cowboy fine.

■ Michael O'Shea's first proposal to Virginia Mayo took place in 1943 when they were working together in a film called Jack London.

Mike didn't know Virginia very well, but one afternoon he spotted her alone in a secluded corner of the set. He tiptoed up behind her, kissed her lightly, and said, "Let's get married."

Virginia whirled around. "You're pretty fresh," she snapped indignantly. Then she got up and stalked off.

Mike didn't give up. Five years later he proposed again. Only this time he knew Virginia better and he had more to offer.

"I've got a nice little ranch house in Van Nuys," he began cautiously. "In fact, I had you in mind when I bought it. If you'll take me along with the house, I promise I'll make you happy."

The O'Sheas had been married a week before Mike summoned enough courage to confess the truth about his "little ranch house."

"I really didn't have you in mind when I bought this house," he said to Virginia, "or it would've been much different. I actually bought it for a horse."

"You bought it for what?" Virginia asked. (Continued on next page)

The dressing room is separated from Virginia's bedroom by louvred doors which are useful for concealing her sewing machine clutter. A desk in the simply and sparsely furnished bedroom holds all her household accounts.

A back and side view of the O'Shea's Van Nuys ranch house gives no inkling of the tumble down place it was when Mike bought it about four years ago. Large trees and careful landscaping help to form this inviting setting.

A front view of the house belies its Western interior. Mike's first work after buying the homestead was to build a brick patio facing his beloved paddock.

The kitchen has every conceivable appliance and when they are alone, Mike and Virginia eat here. The poster is Virginia's trick for livening up a room.

"My quarter horse," Mike said, painfully. "You see, the fellow who was boarding him suddenly sold his ranch and my horse had no place to stay. I was living in a Hollywood apartment and I couldn't keep him there, so one Sunday I drove to the San Fernando Valley and bought a house."

Virginia shook her lovely blonde head. "I can't believe it."

"It's on the level," Mike continued. "And after the deal was set, the people I bought it from told me that the house was 20 years old and not very well-built at that. Can you forgive a dumb guy who loves you?"

"Darling," Virginia whispered reassuringly. "Don't worry. We'll fix the place up."

Four years have elapsed since that day, and any resemblance between the house as it was and the present place is simply an oversight on Virginia's part.

Time, a woman's determination, and money have changed the ramshackle building into one of the most unusual and inviting homes in Hollywood.

At first, Virginia and Mike didn't make any startling changes, largely because they lacked the do-re-mi. Virginia ran up a set of dining room curtains; Mike repainted the kitchen and built a brick patio facing the paddock. They made the rounds of the local (Continued on page 101)

I didn't need a miracle

. . . TO MAKE ME BELIEVE IN GOD'S EXISTENCE. HE HAS LIVED IN MY HEART ALL MY LIFE.

by Lyabeth Scott

■ Less than a year ago I was on a plane miles over the ocean when two of the four motors had to be stopped because of fire. I was part of a group of Hollywood stars flying from Rio de Janeiro to the film festival at Montevideo in Uruguay. We were an hour out of the airport when the pilot's voice suddenly came to us from the loudspeaker in the cabin.

"We have a gas and oil leak and we are returning to Rio. You will notice I am going to get rid of 4,000 gallons of gas."

That's when we saw smoke from one of the motors and noticed that its propeller, as well as the propeller of another motor, was stilled. Then the wing tanks were emptied and we could see the gasoline falling like silver rain below. At that second there was a hush in the plane, and I thought, "How much like a theater it is . . . just before the curtain goes up. Now we shall see the play. Who will be the heroes and heroines, and who the cowards?"

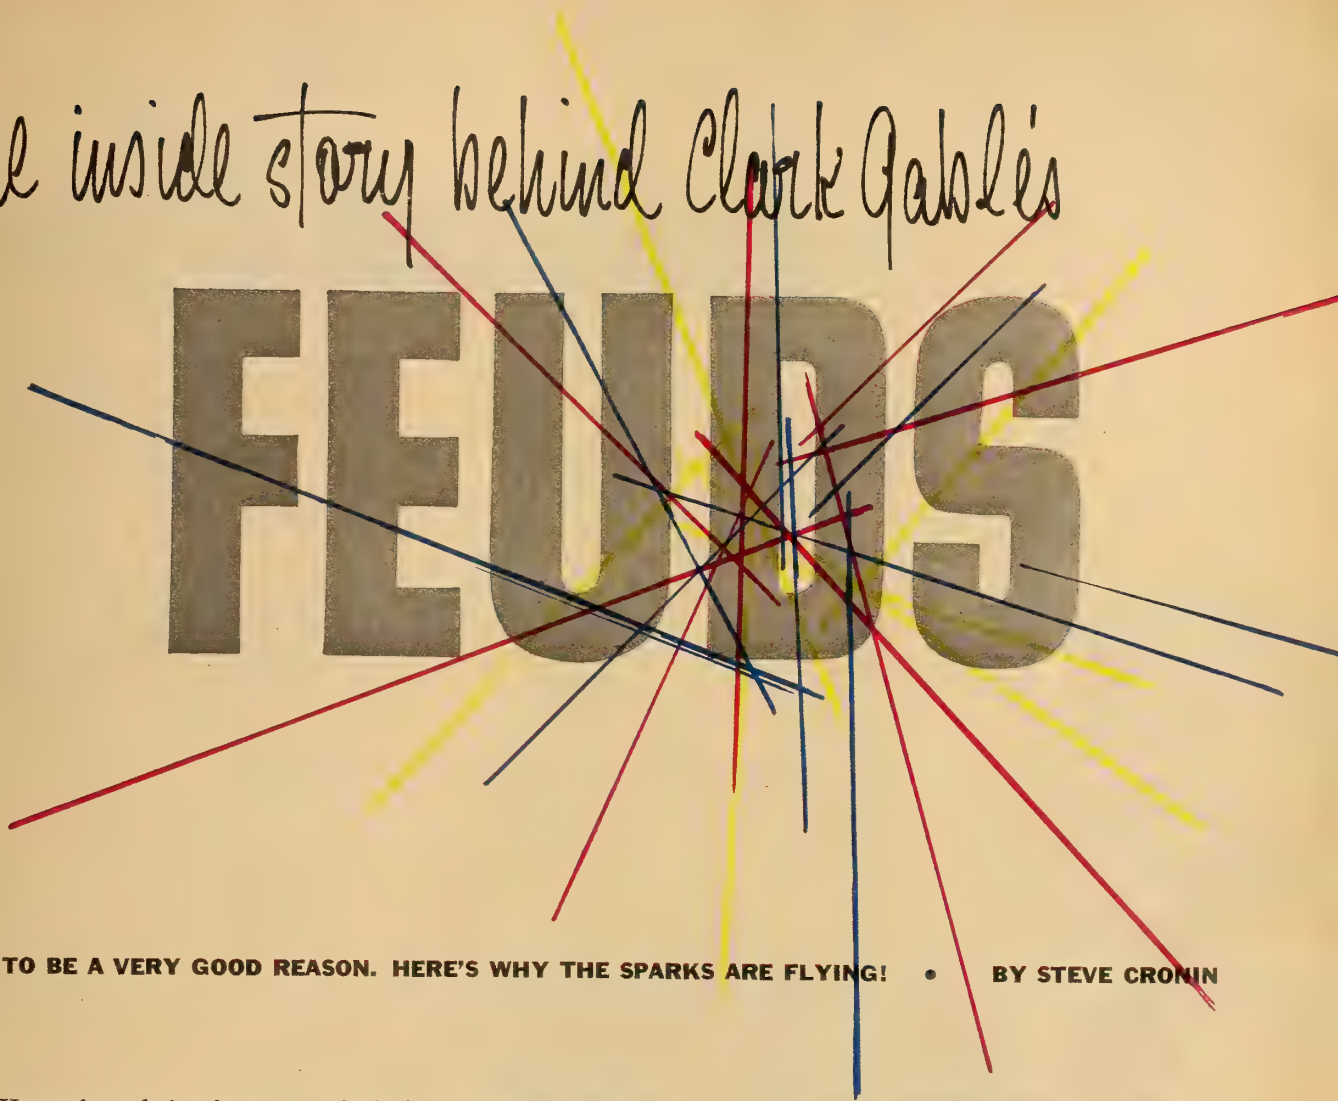
There was a moment of stark terror (for me, at least.) "Well, this is it," I remember thinking. "If this is the cue for death, nothing—not hysteria, not prayer, not fear—nothing will delay the entrance." My faith in God proved itself then, and I sat back and closed my eyes and—yes, I felt serenity.

Can you touch courage? Can you weigh love or nail faith to a wall and say, "There it is"? Nothing less material exists in the world, yet nothing as powerful is at the disposal of humans.

I have always had faith, faith in myself. Long ago when mother waggled a finger at me and said, "Come home from drama school—you've had it." I stood my ground. I don't remember ever having defied a parental edict before. But I knew—don't ask me how—I just knew I could find creative fulfillment in New York if only I were given time to work it out. My letter of explanation must have been eloquent, because mother gave in. But she cut my allowance to ten dollars a week. Ten single dollars between me and starvation in the Big Town! Mom knew what she was doing. I'd get good and hungry. (Continued on page 94)

WHEN GABLE GETS FIGHTING MAD,

■ When you've been in Hollywood as long as Clark Gable has, which is almost 30 years, and you've been married four times, the chances are pretty good that you're going to be involved in some hot feuds, both private and professional.



Right now, Gable's calling a halt to what was his number one feud—with his studio. But his number two feud, no matter what you read about the uncontested divorce, is with his wife, the former Sylvia Ashley.

Clark is also not on the best speaking terms with Greer Garson and two of his previous wives, but these are minor feuds compared with the two major hassels.

A few months ago Gable was staying at the Flying ME, a swank divorce ranch in Franktown, Nevada, waiting out his divorce from Sylvia Ashley. Unfortunately for him, the Nevada divorce plans didn't come off. They were ruled illegal.

At the time, however, Clark didn't the inside story behind Clark Gable's FEUDS

THERE HAS TO BE A VERY GOOD REASON. HERE'S WHY THE SPARKS ARE FLYING! • BY STEVE CRONIN know that. He was busy dating the various divorcees, trap-shooting and riding, and blithely ignoring the messages written for him on the blackboard. These messages were, "Please call Howard Strickling in N. Y." "Call Howard Strickling." "Operator 44 in N. Y. is trying to get you. Howard Strickling calling."

Howard Strickling is Metro's director of publicity, and he was very anxious to get in touch with Clark back then, but Clark was all for hiding away, and having fun.

At that time Clark was really burned up about Sylvia's supposedly extravagant financial demands, but of her, he said, "Sylvia is a very wonderful woman. We've had our differences, largely because we come from different backgrounds, like to do different things. But I admire her a great deal. Our lawyers are conferring, and I'm sure they'll work out a settlement that we'll both finally consider equitable."

What Gable said for public consumption and what he said to his lawyer don't bear the slightest resemblance. His lawyer inferred to reporters that Gable would carry the case to every court in the land if need be, that he was in no mood to be "taken," that he would fight, wade through all the mud, use every means at his command before he fulfilled the demands Sylvia was making for a settlement.

It cost Clark half-a-million dollars to get free of his second wife, the social Ria Langham, and when he realized that he was in the identical position again, this time with Sylvia Ashley, he was fit to be tied.

Because Clark cooled off in February of this year and visited Sylvia at Doctor's Hospital in New York, many people think that their financial feuding is finished, and that a reconciliation is in the offing. The financial feuding has merely simmered down, and there isn't the slightest chance of a reconciliation between them.

By the end of April, Sylvia should have her divorce. It will be uncontested, but only if Clark has agreed to hand over a sizable chunk of currency.

Here's the background of the Ashley-Gable financial feud:

When Clark had all the locks changed on his Encino ranch house last year, Sylvia's vanity was hurt. There is no truer statement than "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." Unless it is "Hell hath no fury like a wife scorned."

Anyway, Sylvia vowed that Clark would pay for her humiliation. Jerry Giesler, ace Hollywood criminal and divorce lawyer, would help her see to that.

When Gable heard that Sylvia was allegedly demanding half-a-million dollars, he blew his top. He drove to Nevada to (Continued on page 72)

a simple case of love

Don't laugh at marriage counselors! Susan and Jess took their problems to one and turned what looked like domestic disaster into marital bliss.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

Twins Timothy (top) and Gregory, receive as much attention from Jess as they do from Susan.

"I fell in love with Jess in 1944," says Susan, "and did the same things other girls do to get their man. The gals are the pursuers, and the men are the ones pursued."

■ In a nation where 8,000,000 married women go to work each day, where, in fact, working wives outnumber unmarried working girls seven to five—no one is shocked because a wife's earning capacity is larger than her husband's. This is especially true in Hollywood where career women started getting married long before it was the vogue in other parts of the country, and where professional couples have since evolved various formulas for ways to stay happy though married. Of all these couples, 32-year-old Susan Hayward and her good-looking actor-husband, 36-year-old Jess Barker seem to have found an ideal recipe for their special needs.

Susan is under contract to 20th Century-Fox. She has one of those fabulous Hollywood deals you read about in the gossip columns. She earns $5,000 a week every week of the year, whether she works or not, and has a seven year contract with no options.

Jess Barker (as fine an actor as Susan is an actress) earns $1,000 a week. This is certainly nothing to scoff at, but Jess isn't under contract to any studio. At one time he was a contract player at Columbia and then Universal, but nowadays he free-lances which means that his income varies. At the moment he is testing for several television shows, and two movie studios are dickering with his agent for term contracts. But chances are that Jess can't hope to equal Susan's yearly income, within the immediate future largely because each is in a different salary bracket.

According to many people this disparity in earning (Continued on page 85)

Other movie stars buy Cadillacs, but what 26-year-old Tony wanted most was an electric train with all the trimmings. He plays with it by the hour.

■ The Tony Curtis-Janet Leigh living room was like Grand Central Station, complete with train, when I arrived at their Wilshire Boulevard apartment for an interview one recent Saturday morning. Janet had gone off to work at MGM in Fearless Fagan, the phone was ringing, the maid was cleaning up the breakfast dishes—and Tony was eating an orange while playing with a new electric train that had arrived from Europe that very morning. You heard me—26 years old, and a movie star, and playing with an electric train. And one that he had bought for himself, not for his kid brother. I ignored it and begged for coffee. Tony made a potful.

Every other magazine writer in town but me had interviewed Tony, yet I had known him longest. I was, in fact, the first Hollywood reporter ever to write a line about him. That was four years ago, when he first arrived from New York, a wide-eyed, scared, naive unknown. I had met him, announced his arrival in my column in a Hollywood trade paper, prophesied a successful career for him and then continued writing about his activities while other columnists ignored him.

Anyway—here I was now. And there was that train. This was a new side of Tony. Maybe I didn't know him so well after all.

"I thought I'd write a story about you and call it 'Now I Can Talk,'" I said, after he got off the phone. "Something that's never been touched on in your other interviews. Something . . ."

The phone rang again. It was his mother. He excused himself, talked to her lovingly for ten minutes, excused himself again after he hung up, and said, "We'll only have a few more disturbances, I promise you. Janet will call once or twice, when she gets a break, and that's all.

"See this train?" He was playing with it again, making it back up. The engine leaped off the track, scattering the coaches right and left. "I didn't have one when I was a kid," he said. "This makes up for it."

His present life is making up for a lot of things he didn't have as a kid. He had been afraid of (Continued on page 99)

Don Taylor, Jan Sterling, lovely in "ice-cream" pink, discuss the entries for the Grand Award winning dress with Board member Janet Leigh.

Ann Blyth and her beau Charles Fitzsimons (Maureen O'Hara's brother) chat about fashions with Anne Baxter, chic in her white hat and blue suit.

Piper Laurie, wearing a gay Spring hat, shows off the tricky, Award Winning Abon Glove Ring clasp, to judges Bill Lundigan, Jane Powell, Debbie Reynolds.

hollywood approved fashions for spring

■ Spring fashions started pouring into MODERN SCREEN'S West Coast office from New York and all points east, and with them—the rains came! By the time MODERN SCREEN was ready to stage its Annual Award Showing of Hollywood Approved Fashions for Spring and Summer, there was a veritable flood flowing past the door of the Bel Air Hotel.

Nevertheless, this isn't the story of a wash-out. Far from it! It's an on-the-spot story of fashion news that was made in Hollywood among the stars gathered in the Bel Air's Garden Room. Seated at luncheon tables decked with flowers they chose their favorite outfits for Spring and Summer glamor.

Guests started trickling into the Bel Air early. Jane Powell shed her rain togs, murmuring, "The things we do for this magazine!" and further predicted that they'd have to call the Coast Guard to take them home.

"That's not all," chimed in Ann Blyth, shaking her dripping umbrella, "I live in the San Fernando Valley and according to the last weather report, the whole place is beginning to shift toward Mexico."

But there wasn't a peep out of Piper Laurie. She was busy enjoying the sudden transition from stormy weather to springtime. The tables were a mass of yellow jonquils, white narcissus, pink and lavender stocks, and early spring tulips. Attractive exhibit booths were displaying merchandise on the sides of the room. (Continued on page 69)

Exciting new fashions went on parade at MODERN SCREEN's gala party; while Hollywood oohed and aahed —and picked the winners!

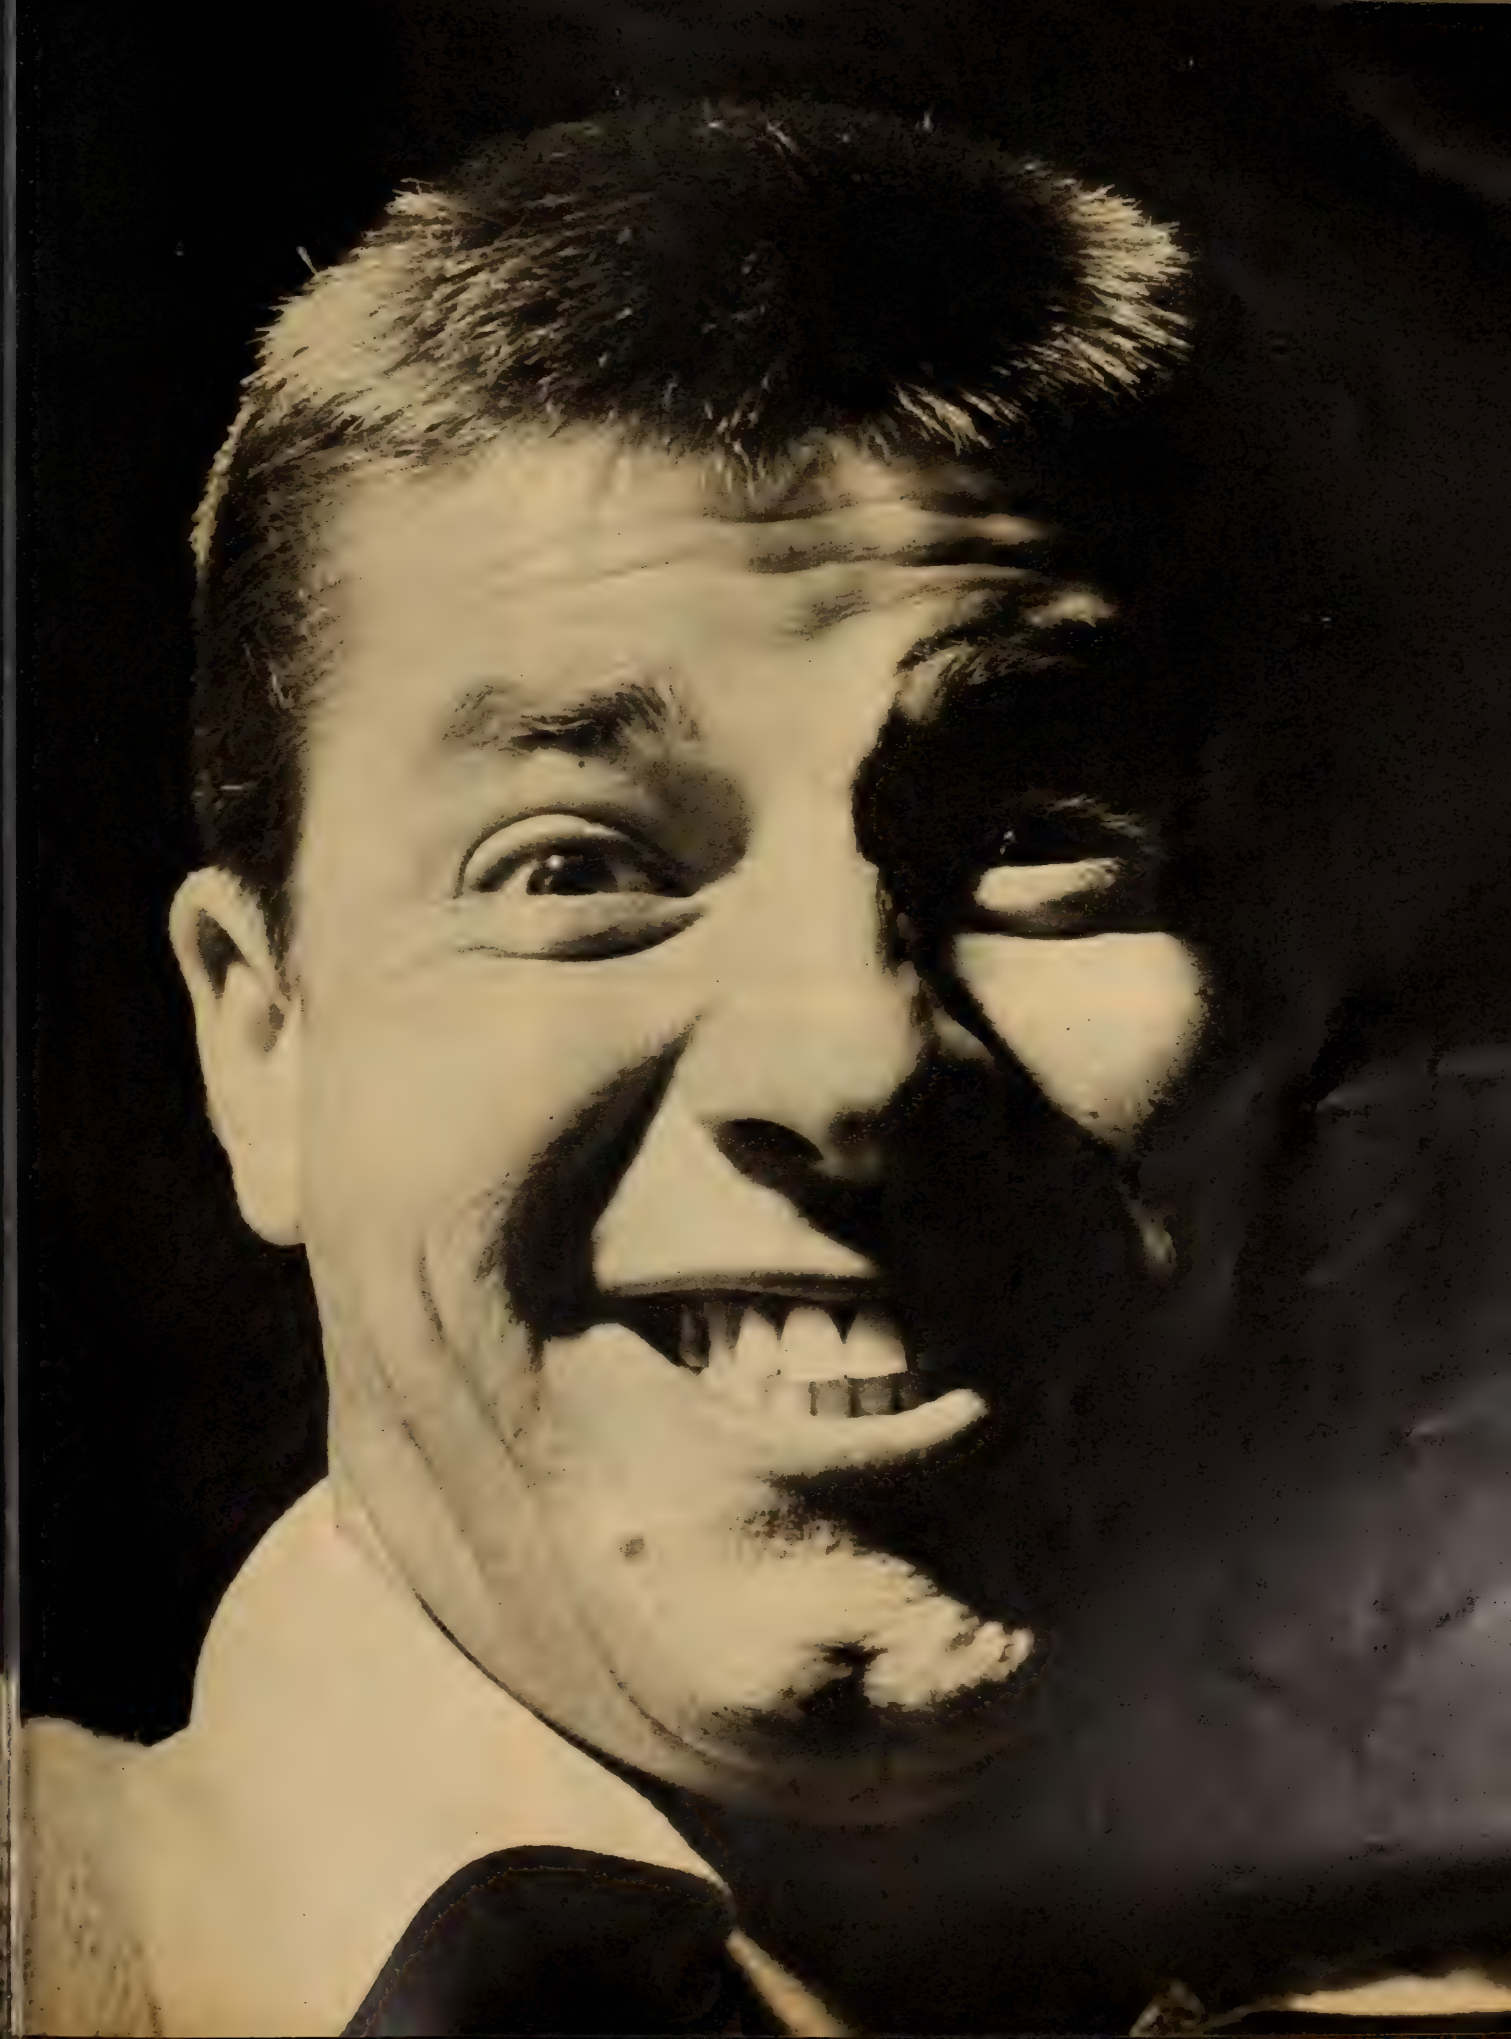
Giggle at Jerry's capers if you will—that's Martin's bread and Lewis's butter. But behind that goony grin lurks a steel trap!

CRAZY

—like a fox



■ Jerry Lewis came to earth with a bang. Literally. His double had already made the jump from the airplane. Now, the camera was picking up Jerry's comedy landing, his feet fantastically tangled in the ropes and paraphernalia of the parachute. Very funny—until Jerry tried to walk away. His ankle was swollen like a balloon. They rushed him to the Hollywood Hospital.

"Sorry, Mr. Lewis," they told him outside the X-ray room. "This is our busy day, you'll have to wait five minutes." Grimacing with pain, Jerry said, "That's okay, gimme a phone." He called his agent and quietly and methodically planned the radio show he was to do with Dean Martin that evening. Just the way he has always planned everything for the top comedy couple of our day.

"I hate to see this guy without a smile on his face, I know it'll cost me a lot of money," Hal Wallis, who is no slouch at business himself, told me when we discussed the Bright Brain masquerading as Jerry Lewis. "How about Dean?" I asked. "Dean," Hal said, "is what Bing Crosby is reported to be—very casual."

But even Bing interviews the girls he is going to sing with. Not Dean. He leaves that and (Continued on page 97)

Debbie acts her age

Debbie Reynolds is one Hollywood star who's willing to shout her age from the house-tops. Just a year past her teens, she's in no hurry to grow up, and she doesn't care who knows it!

BY JANE WILKIE

Her feet were on the coffee table, which meant that Debbie was at home. In fact, she and her parents were engaged in a discussion of teen-agers—their problems and their fun—and Debbie was talking eagerly.

"You see, teen-agers feel that just because they are young doesn't mean—" Debbie suddenly stopped and sat bolt upright. "Oh, brother!" she exploded.

"What's the matter?" her mother wanted to know.

"Well—gee—I just remembered. In April I'll be 20!"

The way she said it made it sound like 90, and Maxene Reynolds smiled to herself. "What's so awful about becoming 20?"

"Don't you see?" asked her daughter. "I won't be a teen-ager any more!"

The conversation took place early this year, and since then Debbie has weathered her twentieth birthday without accumulating a mass of wrinkles, or suffering hardening of the arteries. But she was obviously reluctant to leave the golden days behind.

Debbie is the rare young girl who acts her age and doesn't strain to 'grow up.' Despite all the hoopla about life beginning at 40, and the charm of a woman at 30, no one can deny that the girl in her teens and early twenties has a great treasure—the bloom and the freshness of youth. And youth has never been wasted on Debbie Reynolds, because while she is totally unconscious of the resultant charm, she lets nature take its course in the matter of maturity.

She has never claimed to be older than she is, or to try on the veil of sophistication. "I only ask," she says, "that people give me credit for being as old as I am. When I was 16 and began going out with boys my own age, everybody thought my dates were robbing the cradle. I guess it was because I was small, and the nut of the crowd, but at any rate people thought I ought to be home reading 'The Bobbsey Twins'."

As a matter of fact, her mother despairs that Debbie will never grow up, that she is too imbued with the spirit of Peter Pan to be interested in exotic perfumes, sheer negligees and all the things that go with womanhood. Debbie confines herself to light perfumes, (Continued on next page) still clowns around the house, still collects monkeys, and sighs for the good old days when she had time to toot her French horn. She seems to cling to everything reminiscent of her school days, and once in a while will open her cedar chest and gaze sadly at the blackened chrome on her batons. The other night a girl friend came around with an offer to buy Debbie's French horn, an instrument that is badly needed in a local band. "I just couldn't," said Debbie. "I can't part with it. After all, some day I'll have time to play it again. And the piano, too."

She continues to chew gum, noisily and with great gusto. She has conceded to her mother's pleas in only one respect: she doesn't chew in public. To Debbie, chewing is a relaxation, and when she comes home tired at night, she often climbs into bed with a book and a sizeable chunk of gum. She doesn't smoke, and dislikes the odor of tobacco. "So when Pop smokes, I chew," she says. "And I don't pretend to chew gracefully. I just have a ball of a time."

In subtle ways, Debbie is growing up. Few girls of her age pay any attention to politics, but Debbie, who has always been interested in the inner workings of her native Burbank, has widened her interests to national politics. Last year, on a trip to the Capital, she met and (Continued on page 81)

This trim, suburban house that the Reynolds live in is deceptively modest from the front; you can't see the modern guest house, and swimming pool in the back.

Debbie's "gone Hollywood" in just one way—she now has a swimming pool in her own back yard. Debbie and her friends use it constantly.

Gail, Debbie's niece and special pet, was only three months old when Debbie started teaching her to swim. Deb's even taken her to premieres!

Carleton Carpenter, who was teamed with Debbie in her early movies, went with her on a recent hospital tour.

Bob Wagner's the lucky lad who won the honor of becoming Debbie's first steady beau. But Debbie still says she won't marry till she's 23.

Cool crisp clothes calculated to make you want to hurry the pages off your calendar, flashed by as the models twirled and posed. Leading the "oohs-and-ahs" viewing section were such celebrated guests as Mrs. Jerry Lewis, Nanette Fabray (who just signed with MGM), Barbara Rush and her handsome husband, Jeff Hunter, Maureen O'Hara's brother Dick Fitzsimmons, Joyce Holden and fiance, Dok Stanford, Mrs. Marshall Thompson, Mrs. Cameron Mitchell, Bill Campbell and Marge Champion. (Gower was home recovering from an appendectomy.)

More than 20 apparel and accessory manufacturers were represented, together with leading lingerie, brassiere, and foundation houses. When the modeling was over, it seemed firmly established that cotton dresses would be the high note in fashion for both spring and summer.

Also in the limelight were such accessories as shortie gloves, casual wedgies, little Louis-heels on pastel shoes, pearl jewelry, scarfs, large straw hats, leather handbags, and—an ingenious glove holder.

The official results, as scored by our judges, appear on this month's fashion pages—the intimate apparel winners are listed at right (see lingerie photos in the July fashion pages of MODERN SCREEN).

Fashion board members can be seen in the following pictures: Ann Blyth—Universal International's Sally And Saint Ann. Anne Baxter—Twentieth Century-Fox's Outcasts Of Poker Flat. Joyce and her fiancé Dok Stanford chat with Tony Curtis at Modern Screen's recent party. Tony helped Joyce screen test for The Milkman, which started her career.

Her hair's the color of Kansas corn, her outlook's as normal as blueberry pie—and all Hollywood seems brighter since Joyce Holden's been around!

BY LOUIS POLLOCK

HEY, GOOD LOOKIN'!

■ When she came to the studio she was practically as unknown as a gal can be and still have a couple of friends to say hello. She was just a Kansas City girl who had gotten her legs into TV, laughed easily and spread the feeling around. But that was enough. After a couple of minutes of looking and listening, the head of the talent department started pawing around his desk for a contract she could sign.

As his judgment told him, she could do more than just laugh. The first time she took a screen test it was for Jimmy Durante. When the Schnozzola showed up to see the test, he was very unenthusiastic about her chances to play opposite him in a picture. But when she got through with her number he just fell all over her and cried out gladly, "That's my girl!"

He meant as an actress, of course. The first time she met the boy whose girl she really was to become, he was due elsewhere for a conference. But he didn't go. Forgetting time, place and previous obligations, he sat for five hours across a midnight-to-dawn supper table just dreamily taking her in.

And as for the public . . . the first time she ever made a formal address (Continued on page 83)

behind clark gable's feuds

Sylvia checked that move by obtaining an injunction against his Nevada divorce action. Clark agreed to abide by that injunction. He said, however, that come April 26th, he would show up in the Santa Monica Superior Court and bitterly fight the divorce action.

Sylvia's reply was to catch a plane to Nassau in the Bahamas where she has many friends.

Once in Nassau, Sylvia began seeing quite a bit of a certain Mr. Symington, who apparently was very attracted to her.

As for Clark, he was batting zero. His studio suspended him (for reasons to be explained); he took off for Arizona; he was almost killed in a motor accident; and he was keenly disappointed at the criticism of his two latest movies. There was also the very great possibility that because of the California community property law, any divorce settlement would call upon him to give Sylvia 50% of everything he has earned since their marriage—at least $225,000.

In February, a depressed Gable left for New York with Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Griffin. In New York, Clark appeared at an Eisenhower-for-President rally which was televised, and Metro was in an uproar, since Clark's contract explicitly prohibits his appearance on television.

The studio, however, did nothing and finally dropped the matter.

While Clark was in New York, Sylvia Ashley was in an automobile accident in Nassau, and fractured her ankle, suffering a compound break. She flew to New York and was admitted to the very swank Doctors Hospital.

To the surprise of all, Clark called on his wife. His first visit was considered a courtesy call, chalked up to gallantry. But he showed up the second day, too, and the third and the fourth, staying several hours each time.

Whatever he said to Sylvia, she was in a pretty receptive mood. Friends say this was because she'd learned in Nassau that men still found her attractive. Why scare off a potential fifth husband by rolling the fourth over a barrel?

On his last visit to the hospital, Sylvia was most cheerful. They spent two hours together discussing the divorce. Sylvia said she would compromise on her settlement demands, and Clark said he certainly appreciated her attitude, in fact, he was determined not to contest the divorce, to make it as quick and painless as possible.

The amount of the financial settlement Sylvia Gable is to receive, however, was not decided upon. Certainly, it will be much less than $500,000. The chances are she will settle for $50,000 and legal expenses amounting perhaps to $25,000 more.

When Clark was asked directly if a property settlement had been made, he said, "We discussed it, but the details haven't been worked out as yet. I must say though that Sylvia seemed very willing to co-operate. She was much more cooperative than she was seven or eight months ago. We both feel that it wouldn't be good for either of us to be involved in a drawn-out legal fight. We think the whole matter can be settled in a nice, peaceful way."

Maybe it can. That depends on whether or not Clark will meet Sylvia's minimum financial demands. It took him four years to work out a property settlement with Ria Langham, and he finally saw it through because he was desperately anxious to marry Carole Lombard.

This time, Clark isn't desperately anxious to marry anyone, although Sylvia may be. . . .

In any event, after April 26th, when the divorce will probably be settled, Clark may make it his business to see that his path never again crosses Lady Sylvia's.

From that date on, he plans to concentrate on his career. His feud with Sylvia will have been settled and the only hassel left to conquer will be the professional one with his studio.

Last November, the studio suspended him, taking him off his $7,500-a-week salary because he refused to star in Somebody Loves Me, opposite Ava Gardner.

Clark loves working with Ava—in fact would rather play opposite her than any other actress on the lot—but he didn't love the script, and therefore turned it down.

"Next thing I know," he says, "they put me on suspension. For four months running, I didn't receive any scripts or anything. To be perfectly frank, I don't see much point in working if I can't act in some pretty good stories. I know that good scripts just don't grow on trees, but other actors get good yarns—fellows like Cooper and Peck and Stewart. Why can't I?"

Clark feels that if he can make one or two outside films a year—that is, away from the studio—he not only will have a better choice of material, but he'll be able to keep more money.

"More than half my salary," he explains, "goes for taxes, and while I'm not griping, it would be a healthy thing to get a piece of some picture."

Clark has reference to the system Jimmy Stewart and Gary Cooper have worked out, whereby they star in a film and reap a percentage of the profits. Stewart cleaned up over half a million on Winchester .73 in this manner.

Recently, Gable left his old agent, Bert Allenberg, to sign with the Music Corporation of America. MCA is Stewart's agent, also Gregory Peck's, and both of these boys have prospered well.

Now in all fairness to the studio, it must be said that MGM has tried to buy the best story material available for the King. Writers have been hired and paid enormous sums just to develop plot ideas for him. As one Metro spokesman pointed out, "We try to make the best motion pictures possible. Gable is a big star today because Metro made him one. We spent a fortune developing that guy. He's made millions for the studio—no doubt about that but the way some people talk you'd think we were going out of our way to put him into a series of flops. Every film Gable has been in starts out as a potential winner. No one ever hopes to make a bad picture or even a passable one. We want

Clark, who has been with MGM for 20 years, is a reasonable, kindly man. He's profoundly grateful to Metro, but he knows that he's more than shown his gratitude at the box office.

In the past 20 years, Clark Gable pictures have grossed close to $100,000,000.

Clark feels that he's entitled to a percentage of the profits if he is willing to invest his own money or talent in an independent venture. He has confided to friends that unless the studio agrees to let him do that, he will not renew his contract in 1955.

He feels that since his return from the Air Force in 1945, he has acted in only two good properties, The Hucksters and Command Decision.

His first post-war film, Adventure, was a flop, and as a result of it Clark and Greer Garson, who starred opposite him, don't feel too friendly towards each other.

When Clark reported on the set for the first day's shooting of Adventure, he learned quickly that Greer regarded herself as Metro's number-one star. She had won an Academy Award for Mrs. Miniver, her films were making money hand over fist, and good old Clark—well, he was the veteran come home, who had to be taken care of. Gable resented Greer's quasi-maternal attitude, her benevolent willingness to have him as her co-star.

When Adventure was released it was so bad they couldn't find a producer on the lot who would take credit for it. Gable was hurt. His first comeback effort had laid an egg. Miss Garson's friends attributed the egg to Gable. Clark's pals attributed the egg to Greer.

Today, Gable and Garson hardly talk to each other, and chances of their working together are practically nil.

If you ask Clark about his feud with Greer, however, he says, "She's a wonderful girl, great talent. If the right story came along, I'd be honored to play opposite her."

This is the old Gable gallantry again. It shows up in his feeling toward Metro, too. "With a little luck," he says, "I think I can work everything out." And it's about time that luck broke on Clark's side for a change. For a starter, he's just been put off suspension and the red carpet is down for The King. Everybody at the studio is glad he's back again. END

Some years ago Rosalind Russell was appearing in a revival of Philip Barry's play Holiday, acting the role of the maverick sister, the one who rebels at the stodginess of her too-practical family. In the play Roz was supposed to be moping in her room upstairs, then come downstairs into the drawing room, face her family and say:

"I know what you've been doing. You've been talking behind my back."

That night Rosalind walked downstairs and faced the others. And then out of her mouth came, with all the hauteur at her command:

"I know what you've been doing. You've been talking about my behind!"

her life's companion?

But if ever a bride entered the sacred state of marriage followed by predictions of disaster, that bride was Elizabeth Taylor.

Why?

There is no answer to that question. If there is one, Elizabeth Taylor would like to know it. The London-born 20-year-old woman who became Hollywood's most exciting glamor queen in less than a year has never hurt anyone in her entire life, and she has a few questions of her own she'd like to ask:

"Why does everyone keep harping on the fact that Michael Wilding is old enough to be my father? Why do they say behind my back that this marriage won't last a year? Why do they constantly circulate rumors about my relationship with my parents? Why do they try to hurt me?"

Well, Elizabeth, thanks to you, we have the answers to those questions and a lot more. So, as you have often said in a moment of high anticipation—let's get with it!

People are saying that Michael Wilding is old enough to be your father, Mrs. Wilding, because it's true. He is 40 and you are 20. And the contrast doesn't end there. Like a million other men, he has a receding hairline. Photographed from some angles, he looks very nearly bald, which has nothing to do with anything in a man's life, if he is not an actor. But Mike is an actor, so you'll have to go right on reminding him, as you have so often, to put on his hair piece when you go out in public places.

In this respect, you'll have something in common with Mrs. Bing Crosby and Mrs. John Wayne. Bing and the Duke hate like the devil to go the toupee route, but the whole world knows and nobody minds. Matter of fact, in their own particular way, these two guys are just as romantic to their wives, and the public, as Mr. Michael Wilding is to Mrs. Michael Wilding.

Let's take this thing apart, Elizabeth. Not many weeks ago, you became a bride for a second time. When you emerged from the Caxton registry hall in London —and the crowd pressed around you, exclaiming, "Are you happy?" you told them, from your heart, that you were, at last. But it was not like that a little more than two years ago when you and Nicky Hilton rushed breathlessly away from the huge church wedding. Your first marriage was everyone's dream of happiness but your own.

No one, then, was trying to hurt you. They just didn't know you, for you were a woman and had been for a long time while your family and friends looked upon you as a lovely, if somewhat vague and irresponsible teen-ager.

Remember the big party your folks gave for you when you were 16? The guests were largely your studio co-workers. Charming, adult show people who considered a party without cocktails like a waltz without music. It must have seemed a little strange to you that every now and then couples drifted outside to their cars. And when they came back the aroma that wafted in with them had nothing to do with the fruit punch your mother was serving. No. They knew in advance that this was to be a little girl party, so some of them had brought their own liquor.

Remember how your mother felt about this, and the general behavior of some of the guests? You probably agree, now, that she was right. The trouble was not with the party, but with the people who attended it. They came to be amused, and they were, at your expense.

Memories like this can sink in, turning a normal girl like you into a hard-shelled sophisticate. And in your life there were dozens of little episodes that pointed you in this direction. Like the time a photographer was busily engaged in shooting pictures of you in a somewhat daring sweater pose. While your mother was explaining how carefully you had been brought up, you looked up at the photographer a little wearily and said, "What sort of a look do you want now—one that says I'm waiting for time to go by?"

Frankly, no one can blame you for the resentments that began to build inside you. Many another young actress has grown up happily, allowing everyone to live her life, but from the start you wanted independence. Outwardly, you covered up your emotions with a vague and delightfully confused attitude toward everything.

People were constantly saying, "Oh, that Elizabeth Taylor! She's beautiful and unspoiled, but she's in love with love, and doesn't know what she's doing!" The echoes of these remarks must have reached your ears many times in all their senseless, cloying sweetness.

The Elizabeth Taylor-Nicky Hilton married was this fictional character, not you. And while Nicky was courting you, he had to approach you as though you were a Dresden doll. That's how it happened that you and your friends and family never discovered that Nicky was like most other young men. He liked to drink. He liked to gamble. He didn't mean to lie to you about himself, nor you to him. The trouble was that the whole story of the two of you was created out of the vast enthusiasm of people who wanted you to be their idea of Elizabeth Taylor.

So it was a great shock to both of you to discover that you were strangers. Perhaps it's going too far to say that you were simply "too much woman" for Nicky. At least it can be truthfully said that neither of you knew—not each other—but yourselves well enough to give the marriage a chance. People simply couldn't understand how a honeymoon couple with a present of $15,000 in cash to blow in on a European honeymoon could fail to have a good time. Both you and Nicky soon learned that $15,000 is like a bag of peanuts when it collides with the Monte Carlo gaming tables.

If you want to date your factual arrival at adulthood you might put it at the time you dug into your personal resources and paid for the trip home. Even then both you and Nicky tried to make a go of your marriage. But when you came home, you were plopped right back into the old fiction, and the people who hoped to help "this little girl" straighten things out merely made a hopeless mess.

It's just human nature for friends and relatives not to blame themselves for what happened. That's why, today, they ask the brutal question, "Why is Elizabeth marrying a man old enough to be her father?" But you needn't allow this to hurt you. After all, it's only a set of words, spoken by many of those who should have learned not to interfere.

Your husband, Michael Wilding, is not even distantly related to the Hollywood wolves who made your life so miserable, just after you divorced Nicky. They sent you flowers and expensive gifts. There was not a proposal in the lot,

I WAS AT LIZ'S WEDDING

Dear Mr. Saxon:

Liz Taylor's wedding seemed to come as a welcome relief to Londoners from the gloom that had been hanging over the city since the King's death. Michael Wilding was careful to observe the royal request for dark, quiet clothes, and Liz couldn't have chosen a more suitable color than the grey she wore.

All day Monday (the wedding was on Thursday) Mike waited in his Bruton Street flat for word from Liz. He expected a cable which never came. Liz later explained that a cable would have revealed her identity—she was traveling under the name of Virginia Courtney—and she didn't want "to spoil the game." All of Mike's information seemed to be coming from reporters, and, he said, "I seem to be the only man in London who knows nothing about it." He admitted he'd been afraid Liz was joking when she said she'd marry him. His wedding plans were still vague; he seemed to be relying on Liz to make them.

At eight o'clock that evening, while Wilding was eating a solitary dinner, Liz phoned from New York and told him she would arrive the next day. Mike reserved a suite for her at the Berkeley Hotel, and had it filled with seven baskets of pink and white hyacinths. After dark, he went out to the airport to wait for the plane. He waited two hours, and by the time the plane arrived he was very pale. When Liz appeared, she and Mike faced reporters who asked them for the formula of a successful marriage. Bashful and reticent, Wilding said, "I haven't a clue." But Liz replied, "You can't draw a diagram for a successful marriage. It's a two-way business. All you can hope to do is to work very hard at it and believe sincerely that it is a marriage for life." Then her fiance said, "We're just going to work hard at it and hope for the best."

As Liz and Mike stepped into his car she turned to him and said, "Dooling, you've had your hair cut," and then they drove off to Herbert Wilcox's flat for a snack. (He was to be best man; his wife, Anna Neagle, was Liz's attendant.) Mike was the chef and Liz said she was glad he could cook because she didn't know how. Wilding laughingly announced that he was "pretty hot with ham and eggs." It was 11 P.M. then, and they all rushed to Caxton Hall to make a formal application for a license. They wanted to include that day in the three-day waiting period. When Registrar J. D. Holiday asked to see their divorce papers, Mike produced his but Liz looked alarmed. "I don't have them with me," she said. "But everybody knows I'm divorced." She glanced about her pleadingly. Finally, the Registrar decided that a cable addressed to him from the California court would be satisfactory, and they hurried to send a wire requesting it.

At four-thirty the next day (Wednesday) Liz and Mike were off to Cartier's. It took them just five minutes to go in and pick up the ring he had selected the day before and ordered engraved. (Liz had bought the engagement ring herself because Mike was short of American dollars.) From there, they went to the house of a friend in Bruton Street where they stayed for tea and received a Georgian silver ashtray as a wedding gift. It was dark when they started for Liz's hotel, but they took their time walking over, and stopped to look at the store windows, seemingly most interested in those that displayed furniture.

Liz was up at eight, breakfasted on ham and eggs with Anna Neagle. The waiter who served them asked for an autograph, "The last as Miss Taylor," he said. And then he inquired, "Is this wedding going to be for good, Miss?" "What a silly question," said Liz, annoyed. "Of course it is!"

By eleven she was dressed, but the room was so strewn about with her belongings that she couldn't find her shoes. Finally, they were located at the bottom of a trunk. The shoes were very high-heeled grey pumps just the shade of her bag, slightly darker than her bolero suit whose skirt was held out with two starched petticoats, both threaded with blue ribbon. However, nothing was old or borrowed, so Miss Neagle insisted they trade strands of pearls and lent Liz her handkerchief. Mike was waiting at Caxton Hall along with fourteen guests, including his parents. Just before the ceremony began, Mike's father said in a loud whisper: "She's a wonderful girl, very wise, and she promised me she'd make my boy very happy always." Soon Registrar Holiday announced, "You are now married. You are actually man and wife." Shakily, Liz asked him, "May I kiss the groom now?" "Certainly," said the Registrar, and she did—long and tenderly.

Outside, the crowd had grown and had begun to shout. For a moment, Liz looked terrified and clutched Mike's arm. He whispered something to her and she straightened up. Later, she said that she'd been thrilled by the reception, but at first "It looked like a mob come to draw and quarter me."

The newlyweds spent their wedding night at the Berkeley Hotel and held a very informal reception there the following afternoon. Liz was curled up on a settee, smoking a cigarette in a long holder. A short honeymoon in the French Alps had been planned, and Wilding stated they'd live on his £25 travel allowance.

So the wedding was launched—everyone concerned was pleased. And Liz's mother had been quoted as saying, "I think it's wonderful that Liz married someone older than herself. An older man is more considerate, thoughtful and understanding. He will make Elizabeth more considerate and understanding, too."

Yours,
GISELLE LA FALAISE

You lived alone with your friend Peggy Rutledge in your modest Wilshire Boulevard apartment, with Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis for neighbors. You had a light and meaningless romance with director Stanley Donen which was important only to those who make a living dramatizing the lives of exciting people.

Then came Michael Wilding, a quiet, slender chap, with great personal charm, Mike appeared unobtrusively on the Hollywood scene. We all saw him at small parties now and then, usually among reporters and writers and not with the big money crowd, although Mike Wilding was well-known and acceptable even in the veddy social gatherings. What he most liked to do was sit on the floor at parties, meet new people and enjoy the exchange of creative ideas.

And that's just about the whole story, except that this time you ruled out all the people who had "helped" you before. You made life very tough for reporters who were used to explaining your every move. You spent most of your courtship in the company of the Stewart Grangers, and no newshounds were able to penetrate the curtain around your private life.

When you went to Palm Springs, you cleverly let the word slip that you were headed for New York. And about the time the news finally leaked out that Mike had asked you to marry him and the event would take place any minute, you made reservations in Acapulco. That, Elizabeth, was a cute trick. You completely stumped the editors of MODERN SCREEN. They sent a photographer and reporter all the way to Mexico where they cooled their heels for ten days waiting for you to check into the hotel room on your wedding day.

Now, for awhile at least, you'll have to get used to predictions and rumors that hurt when you see them in print. Frankly, you had to hurt a few people yourself. Like the friends you seemed to drop so abruptly. Perhaps now they realize that this was the only thing you could do. They represented a threat to your happiness, for if they had been in on your plans the world would have been, too. And you can hardly be blamed for not wanting to make a circus of your second marriage.

So you've come to the happy ending, and it can be just that, provided you don't feel that you should continue the drastic measures you've employed. For example, you and Mike have a big problem to face. He must spend almost half his time in England, fulfilling his contracts. That means that it will be difficult for you to create a permanent home. There will be long months during which you will be working in Hollywood, alone. That means that there will be inevitable rumors about a separation. But, if you and Mike realize that you have sincere friends among the press, what the other people say won't bother you at all.

As for your studio, it is only natural that with a little more than a year left on your contract, they will seek to renew it. And, with men like Dore Schary interested in your future there should be a way in which you can make plans that will allow you to spend the greatest share of your time with your husband.

Summing it up, Elizabeth, you've had a rough trip through Hollywood, emotionally speaking. You've earned your present happiness, conducting yourself with grace and dignity. And your answer to those who say, "It can't last" should be simple.

Just tell them, "Nothing in this world is forever, but Mr. and Mrs. Michael Wilding hope to come awfully close to it!" END

Mr. & Mrs. in Korea

I HAVE NO APOLOGY for anything I may say in helping to launch this new department in MODERN SCREEN. Just pull up a chair and let's talk. Frankly speaking, I believe that movie stars are entitled to speak up in public and give a certain amount of advice. I don't hold with the idea that no star should admit to being a Republican for fear of annoying the Democrats, or that if she changes the color of her hair she mustn't ever admit it. I'm going to say what I think and believe—and so will Joan Crawford, Janet Leigh, Betty Hutton, and all the others to follow.

I'M IN FAVOR of poodle haircuts, because men will think we're so wonderfully feminine when we let our hair grow out again . . . I'm for Ike, even though I am a Democrat, but I won't be unless he surrounds himself with those I believe are the right people . . . I am for LeLong's #7, when it comes to men's colognes, and if the company appreciates the plug, they can send me a tank car full of the glorious smelling stuff . . . Fearless me, I am for children rebelling against parents when it comes to choosing careers, if the kids have respectable I.Q.'s. I fought to go to dramatic school, and I'm happy in what I'm doing . . . I am against folks insisting that every girl should be an expert cook . . . Maybe she'll marry a man who can work miracles in the kitchen, like I did. No one in their right minds would call my husband, Paul Douglas, a panty-waist, but he's superb in the kitchen. (Matter of fact, for me he's superb in any part of the house.)

IF YOUR BOY FRIEND is in Korea, I may have seen him there. There's nothing heroic about movie stars flying to the battle front. Personally, I had the time of my life when Paul and I went there, along with a lot of other entertainers . . . Somebody asked me if I was afraid . . . The answer was NO. In the battle area, it's like belonging to an exclusive club. Everyone is in the same boat. You either have the pants scared off you, or you don't care. Funny thing, though. To be the only girl among thousands of men somehow almost makes you forget you are a woman. I didn't feel that I was a man, either—just that we were all of a kind. . . .

I was surprised when one night a sentry was posted in front of the van in which I was to sleep. It was explained that the men had been up there a long time without seeing a woman. Paul asked about the sentry and was told, "He's been up here a long time, too." Everyone broke up laughing, and Paul slept at the entrance to my rugged boudoir. I could hear men shuffling around outside and asking in loud whispers, "Where's the 'broad' sleeping?" But I knew that even without sentry and husband, there would have been no trespassing. They all treated me like angels—those angels!

IF YOU ARE A "DIRTY" BLONDE, which I frankly am without cosmetic aid, you can appreciate the problem of touching up your hair at ten below zero, with only an army helmet to dunk your head in . . . After I had made with the ammonia and peroxide, Paul helped erase the shadowy places I'd missed, with a tooth brush . . . Women ought to look delicate and feminine whether on display before one man or a hundred thousand. Solution: You shampoo your hair once a week. But in a helmet? Try it sometime.

IF YOU'RE PUDGY, which I was as a young girl, you probably are as complexed as a traffic jam. When I was in my teens, I weighed 140 pounds. I was fat all over, and even though some of it was growing weight, I must have been a little horrifying. But I thought I was divine. Today I weigh 108, and I'm not so sure. There's no easy secret to the weight problem . . . Mostly I think it's self-discipline. I don't drink, and I don't diet. Mornings I have eggs. Noons, I eat vegetables. Nights, lean meat. About twice a month I go on a fudge spree . . . Just shun the starchy foods and keep the thought in mind that somebody's going to think you're rather precious. But let it go to the man's head, not to yours.

IF YOU ARE AFRAID of anything, I may have a helpful formula: Don't keep your fears a secret. Admit them. Let those of your friends who are dinner table psychiatrists work you over. Their advice probably will be next to worthless, but you'll laugh at what they think they know . . . Air travel has always given me the shakes. Pretty ridiculous. When we took off for a smooth Constellation ride to Honolulu, Wake Island and all points East, I comforted myself with a St. Christopher medal and a Mazuza. Then somebody gave me a small Buddha, which I took along just in case anything happened over Japanese territory . . . Don't accuse me of being sacrilegious I'm as good an Episcopalian as the next Episcopalian—I hope. (Continued on next page)

I'M WARMING UP. More advice: Don't fall in love with money. I'd tell my kid sister that if I were allowed only one remark. As a child I fell into the "rich kid" classification. Real name: Jane Sterling Adriance; private tutors in Paris and London . . . I had any tendency toward snootiness ground out of me in theater work . . . On the other hand, my husband, Paul Douglas, grew up as a poor boy, which makes him basically a nicer guy than I am . . . Paul gets along with everybody, loves Cadillacs. I drive a little Studebaker, and fight a tendency to be afraid of new acquaintances.

EVER HATE YOUR FACE? Well, I did. For years, all because of a nose that was too full in the middle. It was so bad that every time I looked at anyone I didn't see a face. Only the nose. My dislike spread, privately, to Lana Turner, Betty Grable and 23 starlets with beautiful noses . . . Then, one day, a plastic surgeon of high repute did for me what he had done for so many women. He fixed it. . . . Now I don't care what anyone, including cameramen, thinks about my nose. When they look at me closely I say to myself, "Well, at least I tried!"

One day you too may want a prettier nose, in which case, here's some advice, well meant: Don't have your nose fixed as a whim, because they can never give you back the old one. Don't do it because you have a complex. First you have to get rid of the idea that your nose is ruining your life. Then calculate carefully. If a nose operation will obviously improve your chance for personal happiness, and you can afford it, go ahead . . . But never without the best of surgeons, and not if you are under 20 . . . You may not know your own mind.

THINGS I LOVE: The advice of an ex-glamor girl who told me: "The best way I know to stay beautiful is to fall in love, scrub your face with soap and water and say your prayers with equal thoroughness, every night."

HOME IS A PLACE a lot of girls are in a hurry to get away from, so they can marry, settle down, and build a nest just like the one they left . . . (Think it over. I mean that as a tribute to your parents.) And while on that subject, I don't agree that children should make friends of their parents. Make mothers and fathers of them, instead. They like it that way . . . I've found my real home, at last. Saw it first, several years ago, and it was a Douglas home then—belonging to Melvyn Douglas. When, a couple of months back, Paul and I called an agent about a house, the first thing mentioned was the Douglas home in the old Outpost section of Hollywood, high in the hills. We took it like a shot, and now we're furnishing . . . We're searching the town for furniture we've always wanted—our first selection being a tremendous king-sized bed . . . I want a Utrillo for over the living room mantel, and for Paul's cooking, an O'Keefe and Merritt or some other veritable Wurlitzer of a stove, and a GE refrig. (No endorsement implied; I just like 'em.)

I'LL CONFESS something. As a child I was a BRAT! I've always been a little spoiled, and my husband, bless his heart, hasn't changed me too much . . . Like a million or more other children, I come from what some people refer to as a "broken home" . . . My parents were divorced, and at an early age I learned what it was to be "more to be pitied than censured." Little devil that I was, I played mother against father, and enjoyed being the center of the stage. Got away with it for a long time, too, before somebody spanked my little bottom. Apparently my beloved father and step-dad didn't put too much stock in the loving psychology concerning children of divorce . . . So I've been living happily ever after. Thanks for letting me talk to you.

Yours,

Jan Sterling

debbie acts her age

(Continued from page 66) observed many of our top statesmen and attended a session of Congress. She came away with definite ideas, and is really interested in the voting privilege she will have next year.

On the lighter side, Debbie has finally bought a hat. Her purchase threw the entire household into a tizzie, for Debbie has always scorned any kind of headgear. She not only bought this chapeau, but she wore it, plus gloves, to three consecutive social functions, and Maxene Reynolds sighed happily. "You know," she said to her husband, "I think there's finally a ray of hope after all."

In years gone by, Debbie regarded babies as strange creatures. Lovable, but strange all the same. If you couldn't talk with a character, or dance with a character, what kind of a character was it? Then she became an aunt, and on the day when the baby was left in her care, Debbie toted it over to Gene Kelly's house and from there to MGM, carrying it proudly, and beaming at every compliment.

Debbie's attitude has changed towards her brother, too. Bill had always been the big brother, the guy who knew everything and everybody, but with the passage of time Debbie has caught up with and even passed him in maturity. Now she refers to him as 'my little brother'. Bill doesn't object to this at all. On the contrary, he admires her tremendously.

Debbie's mother and father no longer loom as strange and mystical overlords. In the past three years she has come to know them as real people, to understand their problems and their moods. "I've even got to the point where I know how to work them for what I want," she says, with a grin. Apparently this isn't very difficult, for Ray and Maxene Reynolds have always let Debbie make her own decisions, so she has evolved into a self-reliant girl with sound judgment.

In the past, boys have suffered a lot of pangs over Debbie, and only now she is beginning to realize how unfairly she treated them. "I guess I was sort of scared of fellows then," she says. "And when they'd ask me for a date I'd give them the brush-off. When I look back now, it strikes me I was pretty terrible. I don't know why they even bothered to speak to me." Or, in other words, she is no longer shy with the opposite sex.

WITHOUT being aware of it, Debbie is learning how to talk with people in all walks of life. In her position as a movie star, she's met senators, farmers, lawyers, bricklayers, and the President. Debbie has always liked people, she used to sit on her street corner for hours at a time and watch people go by. But her recent contacts have taught her a lot and given her great poise. Debbie herself says, "Without a movie career, I would have been a jerk."

But growing up has much to do with that, too. Debbie showed definite signs of an oldster when she recently advised a friend not to work so hard at school. The girl in question was bending under the burden of extra-curricular activities along with her regular studies.

"Stick to your schoolwork," opined Miss Reynolds. "Don't knock yourself out working for pins and letters. It isn't worth it."

Two years ago this same Miss Reynolds belonged to every club in school, collected pins and letters like mad, and joined every committee that would take her—and these things were important as life and death to her. But now, from her advanced position as an ex-teen-ager, she realizes that this hullabaloo isn't worth all the trouble.

The neighborhood kids now look to her for advice on clothes and makeup. As the fashion oracle of Evergreen Street, she is a great help to them. They all borrow her clothes despite the fact that some of them (to Debbie's amazement) are growing larger than she is. One girl, barely in her teens, was thrilled by Debbie's offer to lend her a particularly devastating formal. Although she ate nothing all day in order to keep slim for the dress, Maxene and Debbie had to lay her out flat on Debbie's bed in order to close the zipper. Another neighborhood girl, discouraged because of her complexion, came to Debbie for help one evening and Debbie gave her a full treatment, a la MGM.

One of the reasons Debbie acts her age is the fact that she has not gone Hollywood. Most actresses her age begin having flings about town with older men, and drape themselves in furs. Debbie sticks to dating boys two years older than she, realizing that she has more interests in common with people her own age, even though she can hold her own in an older crowd.

Debbie's parents understandably have been concerned over the possibility that their daughter might go berserk with success, and Maxene Reynolds consulted her own mother one day late last spring. "Maybe I'm too close to Debbie to know," she said. "You tell me, frankly, if she has changed with all this Hollywood business."

"She certainly has," said Debbie's grandmother. "She takes much better care of her clothes. And her diction is better. But I can't say the same for the way she keeps her room."

Fortified by this assurance, Mrs. Reynolds took the plunge and suggested to Debbie that perhaps she might want to move into an apartment by herself. Maxene felt it was a plunge because she knows enough about Hollywood to know that when local girls make good and move out of their own homes, they are often on the road to losing their sense of values.

Debbie, though, was amazed at her mother's suggestion. "Why should I move?" she demanded. "I don't want to live in one of those elegrant places. I want to stay right here where I can kick off my shoes if I feel like it."

Actually, Debbie has a distinct aversion to living alone. Ray Reynolds converted the double garage in the rear of their little property into a small guest house, thinking that Debbie might like it for quiet and study. But Debbie wouldn't budge from her accustomed domicile. She just plain likes being with her family, and has stayed away only on those occasional nights when she works late at the studio and is dog tired. Then she shuns the 20-mile trip back to Burbank and stays with Miss Horn, her ex-teacher who lives in nearby Westwood. Sometimes when she is working on a picture Debbie sees little of her parents.

"Well! Look who's here!" says Maxene when Debbie blows in after a few days' absence. "Let's see if you've changed any."

Debbie works hard, as does any actress starting her way up the ladder, and even when she does come home, she wakens after her father has left the house for work, and sometimes goes a whole week without seeing him. "I look in on you in the mornings sometimes," says Ray Reynolds a little wistfully, "just to make sure you're still alive."

She forgoes her piano lessons to concentrate on the singing and dancing needed for movies, and gets so busy she forgets to eat. She manages to keep up her activities as honorary mayor of Burbank, and writes to as many servicemen in Korea as time will allow. Despite her home ties, she wanted desperately to go to North Africa to entertain troops and cried when the doctor wouldn't let her. For Debbie, there is never enough time, and often, she remarks, pensively, "I wish I were back at J. C. Penney's," (she sold blouses there on former summer vacations). "Life was so simple then."

THE "simple life" appeals to Debbie so strongly that she knocked the brass hats off the heads of Warner executives when she was at that studio. Laid off salary temporarily, she found her piggy bank was almost empty, and Christmas was just around the corner. So she went to work at Newberry's, a novelty store of the five-and-dime variety. The studio called at home one day; she was out.

"Well, where is she?" they wanted to know.

"She's working," said Maxene Reynolds simply.

"Working! But she's under contract to us. Where is she working?"

"The hardware counter at Newberry's," Maxene said, and the lid blew off. Debbie was taken to task for such unheard of action, and she listened to the lecture in silence, uncomprehending. If it was Christmas and she needed money, and if Warners wasn't paying her anything, she couldn't see any reason why she shouldn't toddle off and work wherever she pleased.

Hollywood just doesn't impress Debbie, and neither does the flattery that is offered by strangers. The kids on Evergreen Street don't bother. They know that if they were to say to Debbie, "Gee, you were great!", she'd look at them as though they'd gone off their rocker. Because Debbie truly doesn't think she's great. On the other hand, if a friend says, "You know, you were sort of good in that scene," Debbie beams because she can believe it. Sort of good, maybe, but great—never.

She is living two lives right now, her own and that of her work, and she is unaware that Hollywood is rubbing off on her the only way it could rub off on Debbie Reynolds. She has acquired poise and good grooming and considerable glamor, but through it all she continues to have the appeal of the purity of youth.

Debbie doesn't look forward to being sophisticated. There's only one milestone she wonders about. She has made five-dollar bets with everyone that she won't marry before she reaches 23.

The five-dollar bets add up to a small fortune, but Debbie isn't worried about it because she's so positive she'll still be single. Besides, if she is married, her husband will be duty bound to dig in his jeans to pay off. But that'll be a pleasure for the man who hooks Debbie! END

hey, good lookin'!

(Continued from page 70) was at a church convention. The speech started formal and stayed formal—but not the delivery. Into that she put something so human that her audience was soon captivated, rocking with amusement one moment and both warmed and thrilled the next.

That's Joyce Holden. She's not unlike Carole Lombard in her spirit, nor unlike Lupe Velez in her gift for spontaneity, nor unlike Imogene Coca in her flair for mimicry.

Medium-tall and flawlessly fair, with blue eyes and blonde hair that could have come from any—or all—of four lines of forebears, Swedish, English, German and Dutch, Joyce is all-woman. And she's so happily and unaffectedly all-woman that she convinces everyone who meets her that this must be the most wonderful of things to be. That she has a genuine joy of life seems to be the key of her success in meeting people—failure to respond to her is like admitting life means little.

At the MODERN SCREEN cocktail party held a few months ago she entered knowing only a few of the guests. But those few were kept busy by their friends begging for introductions. She left knowing nearly two hundred. She had danced with a half dozen, compared notes with 20 more, and found things to talk and laugh about with all of them.

Bill Holden was brought over to meet her. "Is Holden your real name?" he asked. "It isn't mine."

"Nor mine," quickly responded Joyce. "Who are we?"

"Friends, by George!" replied Bill, delighted with an introduction that was painless in contrast to the many that have to be propped up with stilted conversation.

Bob Mitchum, who scoffs at formalities, met her for the first time at the same affair and delivered a verdict about her in his own expressive way later. "Elegant!" he said. "Yet as casual as a postcard."

How did she come to be that way? Joyce, whose father was a sheet metal contractor, and whose mother was an employment counselor when she was born in Kansas City 21 years ago, has no special explanation. She likes people. She can find things to talk about with anyone, anywhere, and get a kick out of it. And she remembers that when she was nine years old she had to take a new look at life—her parents divorced.

Her mother, with whom she and her older brother, Glen, stayed, had to go to work, and Joyce had to do the buying and cooking after school. With less time to play she learned to squeeze the most out of what she did get. "I just couldn't afford to wait on events, or my playmates," she remembers. "I had to make my own happiness. I couldn't waste time being shy or different. I had to get enough fun out of minutes to last me for hours, and I had to get it out of what was near me, not out of dreams of the far-off and impossible."

RELEASE from her kitchen duties came to Joyce when she was entering high school; her grandparents came to live with them and her grandmother took over the meals and housework. Time hung so heavily on her hands now that she started off a half dozen activities at one time, including modeling, singing, dancing and drawing. She won a scholarship at the Kansas City Art Institute with her drawing, modeled professionally at Harzfeld's department store (where they assumed she was 17) and got herself loused up socially in high school with her dancing.

This last happened when she responded to a call for volunteers to entertain at a

Don't Fail to Read These Frank Facts About the Most Intimate Concern of Your Life...

It's a tragedy that so many young women keep up with the latest fashions and hairdo's yet remain so woefully old-fashioned (really uninformed) about the most intimate concern of their lives—internal feminine cleanliness.

Too many women do not realize the great importance of putting ZONITE in their douche for complete hygiene (including internal feminine cleanliness), for married happiness, their health and to protect against unmentionable odors.

Some women think they have to use harmful poisons, overstrong solutions of which in time can cause serious damage. Others go to the other extreme and use weak homemade solutions of vinegar, salt and soda. Your own good sense should convince you these 'kitchen makeshifts' DO NOT and CAN NOT offer you the great germicidal and deodorizing action of modern ZONITE. Yet ZONITE is absolutely safe to tissues.

Proof of ZONITE'S GREAT SAFETY to Tissues

No other type liquid antiseptic-germicide of all those tested for the douche is so POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues as ZONITE. It is not a poison. It is positively non-irritating. ZONITE contains no phenol, mercury or creosote. It is safe to leave around your home.

ZONITE'S Miracle-Action

ZONITE thoroughly deodorizes. It helps guard against infection and kills every germ it touches. Whereas it's not always possible to contact every germ in the tract, you can depend on ZONITE to immediately kill every reachable germ. It leaves one with such a refreshed dainty feeling. Always use as directed.

THIS IDEAL "ALL-PURPOSE" ANTISEPTIC-GERMICIDE SHOULD BE IN EVERY MEDICINE CHEST

hey, good lookin'!

(Continued from page 70) was at a church convention. The speech started formal and stayed formal—but not the delivery. Into that she put something so human that her audience was soon captivated, rocking with amusement one moment and both warmed and thrilled the next.

That's Joyce Holden. She's not unlike Carole Lombard in her spirit, nor unlike Lupe Velez in her gift for spontaneity, nor unlike Imogene Coca in her flair for mimicry.

Medium-tall and flawlessly fair, with blue eyes and blonde hair that could have come from any—or all—of four lines of forebears, Swedish, English, German and Dutch, Joyce is all-woman. And she's so happily and unaffectedly all-woman that she convinces everyone who meets her that this must be the most wonderful of things to be. That she has a genuine joy of life seems to be the key of her success in meeting people—failure to respond to her is like admitting life means little.

At the MODERN SCREEN cocktail party held a few months ago she entered knowing only a few of the guests. But those few were kept busy by their friends begging for introductions. She left knowing nearly two hundred. She had danced with a half dozen, compared notes with 20 more, and found things to talk and laugh about with all of them.

Bill Holden was brought over to meet her. "Is Holden your real name?" he asked. "It isn't mine."

"Nor mine," quickly responded Joyce. "Who are we?"

"Friends, by George!" replied Bill, delighted with an introduction that was painless in contrast to the many that have to be propped up with stilted conversation.

Bob Mitchum, who scoffs at formalities, met her for the first time at the same affair and delivered a verdict about her in his own expressive way later. "Elegant!" he said. "Yet as casual as a postcard."

How did she come to be that way? Joyce, whose father was a sheet metal contractor, and whose mother was an employment counselor when she was born in Kansas City 21 years ago, has no special explanation. She likes people. She can find things to talk about with anyone, anywhere, and get a kick out of it. And she remembers that when she was nine years old she had to take a new look at life—her parents divorced.

Her mother, with whom she and her older brother, Glen, stayed, had to go to work, and Joyce had to do the buying and cooking after school. With less time to play she learned to squeeze the most out of what she did get. "I just couldn't afford to wait on events, or my playmates," she remembers. "I had to make my own happiness. I couldn't waste time being shy or different. I had to get enough fun out of minutes to last me for hours, and I had to get it out of what was near me, not out of dreams of the far-off and impossible."

RELEASE from her kitchen duties came to Joyce when she was entering high school; her grandparents came to live with them and her grandmother took over the meals and housework. Time hung so heavily on her hands now that she started off a half dozen activities at one time, including modeling, singing, dancing and drawing. She won a scholarship at the Kansas City Art Institute with her drawing, modeled professionally at Harzfeld's department store (where they assumed she was 17) and got herself loused up socially in high school with her dancing.

This last happened when she responded to a call for volunteers to entertain at a

Don't Fail to Read These Frank Facts About the Most Intimate Concern of Your Life...

It's a tragedy that so many young women keep up with the latest fashions and hairdo's yet remain so woefully old-fashioned (really uninformed) about the most intimate concern of their lives—internal feminine cleanliness.

Too many women do not realize the great importance of putting ZONITE in their douche for complete hygiene (including internal feminine cleanliness), for married happiness, their health and to protect against unmentionable odors.

Some women think they have to use harmful poisons, overstrong solutions of which in time can cause serious damage. Others go to the other extreme and use weak homemade solutions of vinegar, salt and soda. Your own good sense should convince you these 'kitchen makeshifts' DO NOT and CAN NOT offer you the great germicidal and deodorizing action of modern ZONITE. Yet ZONITE is absolutely safe to tissues.

Proof of ZONITE'S GREAT SAFETY to Tissues

No other type liquid antiseptic-germicide of all those tested for the douche is so POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues as ZONITE. It is not a poison. It is positively non-irritating. ZONITE contains no phenol, mercury or creosote. It is safe to leave around your home.

ZONITE'S Miracle-Action

ZONITE thoroughly deodorizes. It helps guard against infection and kills every germ it touches. Whereas it's not always possible to contact every germ in the tract, you can depend on ZONITE to immediately kill every reachable germ. It leaves one with such a refreshed dainty feeling. Always use as directed.

THIS IDEAL "ALL-PURPOSE" ANTISEPTIC-GERMICIDE SHOULD BE IN EVERY MEDICINE CHEST

school assembly. Joyce learned the Hawaiian War Chant dance and demonstrated it, cellophane skirts and all, for the teacher in charge. It was approved and she performed it at the next assembly. Unfortunately, the teacher had not bargained on boy psychology. Though the movements of the dance were strictly in classic tradition, the boys did their own interpreting and responded with wolf whistles.

No blame fell on Joyce as far as the school authorities were concerned, but she was soon aware of an undercurrent of resentment on the part of the girls. This was made quite clear not only when she lost out on joining the sorority she had her heart set on, but in many other little ways. For a while Joyce felt crushed, yet actually, all this was to contribute invaluably to her character. Instead of her ways being standardized as to dress, demeanor and custom by sorority decree, she was free to acquire individuality—and she did. One of the girls in school who originally sided against Joyce, but later became a close friend, was smart enough to figure all this out.

"I wish I had been blackballed out of the sorority now," she said. "We're all like little puppets, talking the same, dressing the same, while you're a somebody!"

Most girls who get to Hollywood have dreamed about it for years; almost every girl gives the possibility an occasional thought. Joyce belongs to the latter group. Hollywood, the movies, and the road to stardom on which she is now traveling, were all unplanned developments. After she completed her junior year in high school her mother, Mrs. D. P. Heckert (Joyce's real name is Jo Ann Heckert) took her and her brother to Los Angeles for a two weeks' vacation. Like many visitors, they liked California so much they began to kid each other about not going back. When the two weeks were up they stopped kidding. They knew they were going to stay.

Joyce busied herself the rest of the summer trying to find modeling work and for want of anything else to do entered a couple of beauty contests. When she was ready to enter Hollywood High for her last year she could lay claim not only to being Miss TV of 1948, but Miss Southern California of that year also. In deference to such honors the president of the student council himself introduced her around, but Joyce soon dequeened herself and got down to normalcy—she found that in Hollywood every other girl is a Miss Something-Or-Other. In her class there were, among others, Miss Eye-Lash of 1946, Miss Soy Bean of 1947, and even a Miss Die-Now-And-Pay-Later!

Her mother found a position in Los Angeles and Joyce shortly got back into modeling and made a bid for TV work. Her face and form hit the covers of several national magazines and Ed Wynn picked her as the girl to bring him his funny hats and props on his TV program. Joyce kept on at school while she worked and became a freshman at UCLA, her last stop before fortune literally cut in on her life. She was whirling around the floor at a school dance when a talent agent tapped her partner on the shoulder.

"If I may?" he asked.

Two days later he had brought her to the office of Rufus Le Maire at Universal-International, and not long after that she was pointed out to Jimmy Durante as the girl who should play opposite him in The Milkman.

"I dunno," responded Jimmy, not liking the idea of working with an inexperienced actress. "Let her learn the dance and song routine and we'll see."

Joyce had 24 hours to study her part and Tony Curtis to help her rehearse. If you remember the "It's Bigger Than Both of Us" number from The Milkman you know how much she impressed Durante. But he wasn't the only one to cry out, "That's my girl!" The very same words were uttered by a young writer named Dok Stanford when he dropped into a Beverly Hills movie some months later and saw Joyce on the screen. At that instant an empty life flashed before him which he recognized as his own. And he knew that only she could fill it properly. What happened then he has promised faithfully never to write into any of his scripts because it would never be believed.

IT SEEMS that that very same week Donald O'Connor and his wife, Gwen, invited Joyce to go out on a dinner date with them. They had a partner for her, but at the last moment he had to leave town. Donald was wondering whom he might call to substitute when the telephone rang. It was Dok Stanford, who has known Donald for some years. He had a simple request. Could Donald help him meet a girl at U-I by the name of Joyce Holden? It took Donald 15 minutes to convince Dok he could not only meet her but accompany them to dinner if he wanted to. In the end Dok agreed, even though, as he explained, he would have to leave early for another date. But at two in the morning he was still with Joyce, just looking and listening. Don and Gwen had gone home long since . . . neither Joyce nor Dok knew exactly when.

It has been more than a year since that night and the two have quarreled many times—but never for longer than a minute. For this Dok gives Joyce all the credit. The last time they had harsh words they both lapsed into a deadly silence. Finally Dok spoke, or started to. He got as far as "Well . . ." when Joyce cut in quickly. "I forgive you," she announced.

Joyce is quick with words and these generally reflect her feeling more than her thoughts, yet almost always seem to fit well. A member of Unity Church, she was asked to address 300 members at Unity Farm, the national headquarters in Kansas City, last year. Her subject was on the value of religion as she had found it in her life. She had a serious message but somehow, before her allotted eight minutes were up, she was back on her own level of communication into which the fun of living simply has to creep. If anything it strengthened her talk, but her appreciative listeners found themselves laughing and responding like an audience watching a gay comedy.

Whatever the power of Joyce's personal appeal, it seems to take effect within minutes after exposure to it. "All the good top comedians have it," one of her producers, Lou Breslow, has said. "It's something that can't be cultivated or learned. Put Joyce into a crowd and good feeling seems to ripple out from her."

Dok has a friend, a staid corporation attorney, who not long ago celebrated a wedding anniversary with a party at his home. Dok took Joyce, of course, and when they entered they couldn't believe their eyes. As a festive affair it was a complete failure. Mostly there were lone twosomes made up of husband and wife. Otherwise a few men had gathered together to talk business, leaving wives to take up domestic affairs.

"It's like a wake!" whispered Dok to Joyce. "I'll just say a few words to the host and then we'll go."

Dok went looking for his host, and was talking to him when a burst of laughter and music came from the living room. They went in to find everybody in a merry group around a couple who seemed to be giving a rumba exhibition. One was a short, plump business executive and the other, of course, was Joyce—with her shoes off to stay on eye level with her partner. Dok looked at his watch. It had taken Joyce four minutes to break up the frost.

Even Shelley Winters, who is the current "queen" of the U-I lot, is aware of Joyce's potentialities. One time, at luncheon, a group of players, including Joyce, were talking to a writer known to be almost finished with a comedy script all the girls were crazy about. Soon Shelley walked up and addressed him.

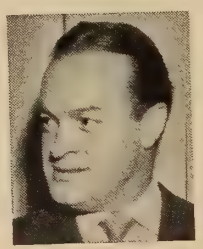
"Is that script finished yet?" she asked. "I got to do it, remember. Nobody else but me!"

Joyce turned to Shelley. "I don't blame you, Shelley. It's an awfully cute script and I would just love to do it myself."

Shelley thought a moment, her eyes studying Joyce thoughtfully. "Well, all right," she said finally. "You can do it. You got talent."

Actually it will be up to the studio to decide who will do the script, but coming from Shelley Winters, to whom talent is art, and art is all—this was a statement so momentous as to almost split the studio gossip pipeline wide open

Since over-ambition is not a characteristic of Joyce's temperament, she is not unduly concerned about her career and is content to await the future. Since The Milkman she has made five pictures, including The Iron Man, with Jeff Chandler, and her latest is a modern spectacle of the west, Bronco Busters, in which Scott Brady and John Lund are starred with her.



She's going to marry Dok and they keep setting dates to set a date. In the meantime she lives at home with her mother, writes letters to her brother who is in the Navy, and keeps her hand in at cooking. She likes to eat everything that comes in a pot—especially stews and fricassees.

She used to love to buy handbags but had trouble finding shoes to match. Now she has learned to buy them at the same time. She has keen hearing and once, when her mother noticed her with her ear to the wall, claimed that she was listening to termites chewing away at the studs. Her hearing comes in handy when introductions are made. She isn't the kind names fly by. Last year on a visit to San Jose College during a world premiere she was taken to the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity for a brief cocktail party. There were 30 members present and she stayed just 20 minutes. When she left she said goodbye to 24 of the boys by name.

You can be sure that none of the 24, or the 30, for that matter, will forget her easily. And that goes for everyone who meets her!

I SAW IT HAPPEN

During Bob Hope's personal appearance at the New York Paramount Theater, the weather was rather cold and windy. a simple case of love

(Continued from page 53) capacity should lead to big trouble. Jess should feel bitter, outraged, inferior. He should resent, at least subconsciously, his wife's success. Susan, too, should feel cheated, guilty, domineering. After all, she's the major bread-winner in the family, and doesn't that weaken her role as a woman?

The chronic prophets of doom have not only predicted divorce for Susan and Jess, but they're anticipating marital disaster, on the same basis, for Loretta Young and Tom Lewis, Esther Williams and Ben Gage, Anne Baxter and John Hodiak, Virginia Mayo and Michael O'Shea, and all the rest of those professional or non-professional couples whose incomes are unequal in the wife's favor.

Of course, if you predict divorce for ten or 20 Hollywood couples, you're likely to be right occasionally. It's like betting on every horse in a race; you're bound to come up with the winner. But in the case of Susan Hayward and Jess Barker, which is essentially a case of love, the chances of marriage failure are very small. The Barkers are intelligent people who have faced up to their problems, surmounted the obstacles (although this took a good deal of adjustment) and are now very happily married in a most un-Hollywood way.

"Susan and I," Jess explains, "regard our marriage as a partnership. Whatever each of us earns goes into the family bankroll. The very nature of the entertainment business is cyclical. Right now Susan is having a great run. Next year or maybe the year after, it'll be my turn. There's no point in becoming a neurotic just because your wife is a big success.

"I admit frankly that when a man isn't working, especially an actor, it can get on his nerves. He begins to brood, becomes jumpy and irritable. It's happened to me. But you've got to snap out of it. It's not fair to you, not fair to your wife, and certainly not fair to your children."

SUSAN Hayward, who is probably one of the most intelligent actresses in Hollywood, presents her point of view this way: "I'm not competing with Jess for acting laurels or earning money or anything. I'm collaborating with him. Who can properly judge the relative contributions to any collaboration? In a marriage it doesn't particularly matter if the wife's monetary contribution is greater than the husband's, just so long as they both contribute love and understanding and mutual effort."

It's well known in Hollywood that when Susan is away on location and Jess is at home, he looks after their seven-year-old twins, Timothy and Gregory—when he isn't working.

A year ago when Susan was in Georgia for I'd Climb The Highest Mountain, Jess phoned her one evening and said that their housekeeper had quit. "What am I going to do?" he asked. "Who's going to prepare food for the twins?"

Susan promptly dictated a detailed list of instructions on the care and feeding of twins. She also gave Jess a few recipes and suggested that he buy some supplies, and try to cook dinner himself.

A pretty resourceful guy, Jess did exactly that, and when Susan phoned from location each day thereafter to find out how he was doing, Jess assured her that as an amateur cook he wasn't half-bad.

What was even more important, he showed no resentment at bearing his share of the family domestic load.

In Hollywood this is pretty unusual. It calls for maturity, honesty, and the frank acknowledgement of realities. There are dozens of actor husbands who would sooner be caught dead than be seen wheeling a carriage, or shopping at the supermarket. These fathers see their children for a few hours on weekends, kiss them goodnight on weekdays, and consider their responsibilities ended.

Jess Barker is different. In the past few years, he has probably spent even more time with Tim and Gregory than Susan has, because when Susan is working, she leaves the house at six or seven in the morning and doesn't return until seven-thirty at night when the boys are ready for bed.

Thus, while Susan is contributing money to the family collaboration, Jess is contributing love and affection to his sons. When Jess is working, Susan tries to arrange her schedule so that she can devote ample attention to the boys.

Efficient and workable as their marriage is today, there was a time when things weren't running so smoothly.

About four years ago, Susan and Jess were squabbling incessantly, "about little things, minor peeves, quarrels which festered and ran on for three or four days."

This happens in many marriages and unless the quarrels are seen in true perspective, they frequently develop into major troubles.

Well, four years ago, Susan and Jess had many career problems. Susan was under contract to Walter Wanger at the time, and he was ready to sell her contract to a major studio. Jess, who'd been with Universal, failed to have his option lifted. Optimism in the Barker household was at a low ebb during this period. Had two less intelligent persons been involved, the affair would have resolved itself in a divorce court. But Susan and Jess took their troubles to a marriage counselor.

What he told them in essence was this: "You're both in the same profession. Economically, you have the same background. You were poor in your youth, ambitious, eager to get ahead. Whether you know it or not, you're competing against each other. Jess is the man of the house. He feels he should be the dominant wage-earner. Susan is a fine actress. She feels she should exploit her talents.

"Your quarrels probably stem from these frustrations, but a marriage can't last if the husband and wife compete against each other. You've got to compromise and collaborate. And most important of all, quarrels should be settled before you go to bed. Never carry an argument over into the following day."

Susan admits that she and Jess still argue about things. "But every night we kiss before we go to bed, and in the morning there are never any hard feelings."

This intellectual approach to marital difficulties is characteristic of Susan Hayward's entire approach to life. Seek out the best advice and then without any delay follow it through with determination.

Her history bears that out.

She was born Edythe Marrener in Brooklyn on June 30, 1919. Her father was a wireman for the Interborough Rapid Transit Company.

As a little girl, her life was harsh. There was never enough money for little luxuries, and when she was graduated from Girls' Commercial High School, she had to get a job. "I wasn't trained for anything," she recalls, "but I had to earn some money, so I got a job as a model."

Just about this time, David Selznick was beating the bushes for an unknown actress to play the part of Scarlett O'Hara in Gone With The Wind. One of his directors, George Cukor, happened to pick up an issue of The Saturday Evening Post in which he saw a fetching picture of the hazel-eyed redhead.

Susan was tested for the role first in New York and then in Hollywood. After three weeks in Hollywood at $50 a week, she was told that she wasn't "right for the part."

Instead of returning to Brooklyn, Susan moved into a cheap bungalow with her sister. "I was determined," she says, "to get a job in pictures."

The job wasn't very long in coming. One afternoon, Susan rented a bike, lost control of it, and wound up in a prone position on the lawn of an agent named Benny Medford. Benny says, "I took one look at her, and I knew she belonged in the movies. I took her out to Warners, and they signed her at $50 a week, but they dropped her after six months. I was sure she had what it takes, and so was she, so we went over to Paramount. She sang a song or two for the boys and they gave her a contract at $250 a week."

At this point, Susan was bent on becoming a great dramatic actress. However, Paramount never realized how good she was. They put her in a series of minor B's and then sent her around the country to exploit other Paramount pictures. She did this for years. Her salary kept mounting, but she couldn't get any good parts.

Finally, Susan decided to strike a blow for Susan. When the Paramount film salesmen came out to Hollywood for their annual convention, she and every other actress on the lot were introduced to the men by studio vice-president Y. Frank Freeman. The other actresses merely nodded, uttered an idle pleasantry and left the stage. But not Hayward. She made a speech. "Most of you gentlemen,"

Youth is not all it's cracked up to be—because there are so many terrible things to find out about!
Judy Garland

she said, "know me already. I've met many of you on tours in your home towns and it's good to see you again. In the past you've been kind enough to ask why you haven't seen me in any pictures. There's one man here who can answer that question. Mr. Freeman, will you please tell these gentlemen why I'm not in any pictures?"

Y. Frank Freeman wasn't studio vice-president for nothing. "Don't worry, my girl," he said. "You'll soon be in plenty of pictures. We have big plans for you."

Susan was given a top role in Reap The Wild Wind and then loaned to Columbia to star with Ingrid Bergman and Warner Baxter in Adam Had Four Sons. In each of these films, her acting was superb, and Edythe Marrener was on her way.

One night in 1944, when Susan was working at the Hollywood Canteen, a tall, very handsome young actor, who was emceeing the entertainment, came over and introduced himself. He was Jess Barker, and as soon as she heard the name, Susan quickly realized that this was the fellow over at Columbia who was being called the hottest young actor in Hollywood. The fellow who'd played opposite the great ladies of the stage, in New York, and was now scheduled for a featured part in Cover Girl, with Rita Hayworth.

That night Jess asked Susan if he might take her home.

That would be very nice, Susan thought.

Jess took her home—she was living with her mother at the time—but when he tried to give her a goodnight kiss, she hauled off and let him have a beautiful right-hand slap in the face.

Barker was stunned and Susan was insulted. She rushed into the house and slammed the door before he could apologize.

Barker couldn't figure it out. Here was an actress who'd been working in Hollywood for years, an experienced young woman who'd been around. What sort of reaction was that?

During the next week, he phoned three times. Susan refused to come to the phone. However, she made it a point to turn up again at the Canteen and run into Jess.

She has subsequently admitted that "in the game of love, the gals are always the pursuers and the men the pursued."

"Every woman," she says, "when she first sees her Prince Charming, tries to find out how she can meet him again—accidentally. But she isn't satisfied unless her pursuit causes his pursuit. Of course, after you're married, you're dead certain that it was your husband who did the pursuing. I guess that particular feeling is a woman's face-saving device.

"Actually Jess and I broke our engagement twice in six months before we decided we were absolutely right for each other."

Whatever the Hayward tactics, they worked. In 1944, Jess took Susan as his wife.

During the early years of their marriage, both of the Barkers' careers were on the upswing. Susan left Paramount and was immediately signed by Walter Wanger who started to give her some fine pictures. And Jess was working out at Universal. They were both earning a lot of money, and the future looked good. There was no problem of the wife's overshadowing her husband.

That problem came into being when 20th Century-Fox bought up Susan's contract from Wanger and set about making her one of the really top-flight dramatic actresses in the business.

That's when people began sympathizing with Jess and predicting that his ego would be unable to stand the strain of his wife's success.

They were right for a short period of time—until Susan and Jess with a marriage counselor's aid, worked out their own design for happy living.

Today, despite the fact that Susan has starred in five successive hits—Rawhide, I'd Climb The Highest Mountain, I Can Get It For You Wholesale, David And Bathsheba, and With A Song In My Heart—the Jess Barkers are easily one of the happiest, most well-adjusted couples in Hollywood.

Susan realizes that because of her success, it is sometimes almost impossible for Jess to get a job. Only recently, Barker was up for a big part at a major studio. "What do you need a job for?" the casting director asked him. "Your wife's making plenty of money."

That's a pretty typical attitude in Hollywood, and it is a most trying obstacle to surmount. Barker is a man with lots of talent and courage. He can't go to a casting director and say, "Sure, my wife's making a lot of money, but suppose she stops after three or four years? What happens then? Today with taxes, not very much is left. I have to work, just because my wife is working, too, doesn't mean I should retire."

But Jess says none of this, and he never mentions to Susan the problems which beset the actor-husband of a successful actress-wife. He keeps them to himself, makes the rounds of the studios, takes whatever parts, large and small, that are offered to him and hopes one day that a lucky break and a lot of honest effort will land him on stardom's top rung.

Until that day arrives, he and Susan have no intention of endangering what is now one of the most solid marriages in town. END

"someone to watch over me"

(Continued from page 24) For 20 exciting, song-filled weeks, the star who had tried to end her life in despair before she met Sid Luft, had made show business history. Not only had she become the world's highest paid performer, but she was acknowledged by all to be tops in her profession. Sophie Tucker, the grand old veteran of song, had wept on opening night at the comeback drama of the glorious Garland voice and sense of showmanship.

Looking back over those satisfying weeks, Judy said, "This whole thing at the Palace has been magical." Huddled in her cotton dressing-gown, she looked youthful and slender once again.

"Sid has done it for me," she said simply.

He re-entered the room which he had left when Judy started to discuss her feelings for him.

"That's my fella," she praised as she watched him adoringly through the dressingtable mirror. Brown-haired, brown-eyed, with much the same coloring as Judy, the soft-spoken Luft is tall, slender and handsome.

There is no inordinate display of affection from this couple in love. Just a quiet acceptance and understanding of what each means to the other.

The telephone rang. It was for Luft who was arranging some last minute details for a closing night party in the theatre. Judy had been disappointed earlier that they might not be able to hold it in the Palace, but Luft with deft, able management had smoothed out the wrinkles, much to Judy's pleasure.

He explained to her in amusing detail how he had accomplished it. Her upturned nose crinkled in gleeful delight at his recital and she doubled up in joyous laughter.

The happy secure girl was far different from the frightened, bewildered, overweight creature she had been before Luft and love changed her life.

Before they first went out together, each was living a day to day existence. Luft, too, was at loose ends.

The romance between Judy Garland and Sid Luft was almost over before it began.

It happened like this:

"Judy Garland, please. Sid Luft is calling."

"Just a moment, sir. I'll see if she's in." The New York hotel switchboard operator left the line. When she returned, she said briskly: "Miss Garland has gone out."

Disappointed, Sid Luft hung up the telephone. Perhaps he hadn't been definite enough about the date he had arranged for that November night in 1950. Maybe Judy misunderstood or maybe she was just kidding a few evenings before when she agreed to go out with him. They had met at a party. Later when the group went to El Morocco, he and Judy had danced together and laughed together, too.

"Well," Luft reasoned as he walked away from the phone, "I guess it's just one of those things."

The same unhappy thoughts were sifting through the mind of the singing star as she paced the livingroom of her hotel suite. In a wall mirror she caught her reflection, all dressed up and obviously not going any place.

"You might as well take your hat off, Judy," she told her shining self. "You've been stood up."

It might have ended there except that a few nights later, the two met again at a New York party, this time a bit frostily. But nobody can be indifferent for long when Judy Garland's around.

"What happened to you the other night?" Luft got up enough courage to ask her.

Judy's famous cascading laugh rang out. "What happened to me? I like that. What happened to you? I was there!"

In the midst of relieved explanations they made another date and kept it.

The Garland laugh which had been stifled too long in the months of personal tragedy and turmoil rang out more often after that and it was no coincidence that she laughed longest and happiest when Sid Luft was at her side.

The sparkle was back in her deep brown eyes, her voice and her smile.

Judy Garland was in love!

Her millions of fans who sat in judgment on everything she did took a dim view of this new man in her life.

"Did Judy do the right thing in divorcing her director-husband, Vincente Minnelli?" they asked querulously. "Should she have terminated her contract with MGM? Will this Luft, Lynn Bari's ex-husband, break her heart?"

The valiant singing star heard these rumblings. In the hectic years before when she was a pliable puppet whose talent and destinies were pulled and tugged at by many, she might have listened, but in her own emotional upheaval of maturity she had broken the strings that had made her bow and sing and dance to others' biddings.

At long last, she was a free soul.

"Judy and I never had any doubts," Luft told this writer.

"I love Judy. I want to protect her from the trauma she once knew. I don't want her to be bewildered or hurt again. I want her to have happiness. She knows now what she wants and that's to be free to make her own decisions, not to be tied down to any studio. I, nor anyone else, can ever force her to do anything she doesn't want to do. When she was a child and a star, everyone was telling her what was good for her. She listened. The only security she knew was that she had a talent, one that she takes for granted because singing is as much a part of her as breathing. She has no desire to retire because she always has to sing."

Whenever Judy enters a room, even if it's filled with glamorous women in jewels and furs, somehow Judy involuntarily takes over the room. That's the magic of her talent.

It was in London, where Judy had cabled Luft in Hollywood to join her "for morale support" that the star asked him to manage a tour she was to make in the English and Scottish provinces. He realized that physical health and exercise were as essential to her well-being as emotional security. In Scotland, Luft, a good golfer, introduced Judy to the game that originated there.

"Her fourth time on a golf course, she shot a 48 for nine holes," he recalled with pardonable pride. "In Glasgow I had a set of clubs made to her measure—she's not very tall, you know, and needed special clubs. We had a little set made for her daughter Liza, too, with her name on them."

After her endurance test of 20 record-breaking weeks at the Palace theatre, Judy proved she is in top condition again.

That last night as she sat in the dressing room and discussed her plans, she admitted with a peaceful, gentle smile that for the first time in many years she had no problems. She was no longer the puppet on the string. No one was tugging at her.

Her future had been planned at her own bidding; marriage to Luft at a then undisclosed time and place, and a sunny sojourn in Florida with rest and golf her prime requisites.

In the latter part of April, she said, she was scheduled to appear at the Philharmonic Auditorium for four weeks in her show which carries the credit line, "Production under Supervision of Sidney Luft." After Los Angeles, she planned to take her act to San Francisco. In late fall, she hopes to make her first movie since Summer Stock.

"None of this would have been possible," she said glowingly, "without Sid. He and I have accomplished so much in the last year. He's the kind of person you can lean against if you fall down. He's strong and protects me. I respect him. And most important, I like him as much as I love him." END

happy anniversary

(Continued from page 35) home for her new husband. Many another actress has found the task impossible. Not Doris. When she watched the big man walk up the path from his car with a couple of huge suitcases in his hands, there was a warm feeling in her heart because this man was to open the door to the happiest chapter in her life.

During those first few days, Marty did the usual things that new husbands do. He'd put the cigarette box where the lighter was supposed to be. Or he'd put his slippers at the head of the bed, instead of at the foot. And Doris did things that caused an equal amount of delightful confusion. And it was fun for them all, particularly for Doris' son, Terry, because there was another guy around now. Marty was something of a hero to him.

It wasn't for a week, probably, that Marty's most amazing trait came to light. That was when Doris learned for the first time that she had married a fixer. A tool-crazy amateur repair man.

It was on a Sunday morning. Marty got up from the breakfast table and sauntered over to the window that looked out on to the garden. He observed the area speculatively for a few minutes, then went outdoors. He sauntered around the yard a bit and then, with one foot touching the other he began to pace off the gravel walk, measuring it. Doris eyed him suspiciously through the window and then went into the yard herself. "Good heavens," she thought. "He's probably going to put up an apartment house here."

"Something wrong, honey?" she asked.

"No," said Marty somberly, "I think I'm going to put a brick walk in here."

"Did you ever put a brick walk in anywhere else?" Doris asked quietly.

"Nn-nn," said Marty, "but it's easy."

And it was easy. At five o'clock that evening, 20 feet of neat brick walk had been set. Marty was exhausted, but game. He shuffled off to bed, and was asleep in 20 seconds. At which point Doris exclaimed to herself, "What a man I married!"

WITHIN a very few months, Doris became reconciled to the fact that she was living with an uninhibited jack of all trades. If they were on their way to dinner or a show and Marty snapped a light switch and it didn't work, he would quietly mutter, "This will only take a minute," and scamper to the garage for his tool kit. He would have the switch out of the wall in no time and before you could say "Let's call an electrician," have the thing all over the floor. "He's the only man I know," Doris would say, "who went to parties with tool grease on his tuxedo."

If an electric iron broke it became necessary to keep it a dark secret or Marty wouldn't have gone to the office. If the washing machine broke down, the family lived in horror of the thought that he'd find out. And subterfuge didn't work, because Marty was given to unexpected tours of inspection. Whenever Doris heard a chortle of triumph from some recess of the house, she'd groan in terror because she'd know her husband had detected a flaw in some mechanical contraption that he'd have in pieces before she could get there to save it.

Everything that Marty repaired worked fine afterwards, because Doris would call in the proper mechanic the next day to fix it right—and Marty, not knowing this, swaggered about among his accomplishments like a victory-drunk genius.

"Do you know how we spend our spare time?" Doris once asked a friend. "We'll be sitting in the garden having a nice rest when Marty will say, 'I feel like a breath of air. Let's go for a ride.' And we go for a ride—to the nearest war surplus store. And I spend a couple of delightful hours among shell casings and rubber rafts. And it's worse when I don't go with him. He'll bring back gas masks, radar equipment, winches, jeep wheels and maybe a pup tent or two. And he always claims he has a use for them. When I get my car in the garage I can't get out of it, there's so much junk in there."

A man can be a trial in many ways during the first year of marriage, but Marty and Doris frankly have had no adjustment problems. There are those who say that Doris and Marty are difficult these days because they do not open their home wide to journalistic sightseers. They have a pair of careers that jell perfectly. Doris in pictures and records. Marty as an agent whose main interest is music publishing. Marty, with his fine sense of humor, will talk endlessly with his friends among reporters, but he drives them a little insane by refusing to behave like the usual new Hollywood husband who brims over with intimate anecdotes about his bride. For one thing, he is too busy with his own career. For another, he is too busy with Doris and other important matters—not the least of which is helping the kids in their block perfect a small fort from which they conduct mock wars. More often than not, he is joined by Doris in this worthy project while an army of magazine writers fret about how unavailable they are.

And how does Doris feel about all this? Well, most girls would rather go shopping on a day off than lie in bed and have a store deliver a truckload of merchandise free. Doris Day is no different. There is some secret thrill she shares with all females that comes from peering into glass show cases and trying on shoes and gowns she hasn't the slightest intention of buying.

"It happens often," Doris said. "Marty will say, 'Come on, kid let's go into Beverly Hills and do a bit of shopping.' I dash to the car before he changes his mind, my head whirling with dreams of silk and leather and gold. And do you know where we go shopping? In a hardware store. I linger close to the door for a couple of hours, wistfully thinking of Saks and Magnins while Marty wallows in Stillson wrenches and ball-peen hammers. My heart is in the May Company basement—while his is in the screw driver or the nut and bolt department of the hardware store. One day he discovered aluminum nails and he went into such a fit of ecstasy over the astonishing advantages of the things that he almost had me convinced we should buy a couple of barrels of them, get a couple of hammers, and go home and pull all the old iron nails out of our house and replace them with aluminum ones before the building collapsed."

CHRISTMAS time is a time for gifts and part of the joy of Christmas is slyly trying to find out what a person would like, so that there will be a delightful surprise under the tree on Christmas morning.

"Ha!" said Doris Day about Christmas. "Two months before December 25th I asked Marty what time it was. 'Tools,' he said. The next day I asked him what time he'd be home from work. 'Tools,' he said. When he injured his finger in the car door, instead of a masculine oath he howled, 'TOOLS!' And then several weeks before Christmas all his equipment mysteriously disappeared. He'd glare at a useless toaster and scowl that he'd fix the doggone thing in a jiffy if he had even a screw driver. If he had even a nail file with a razor edge!

Red Skelton and Zsa Zsa Gabor were rehearsing a scene at MGM. In the middle of the routine Red suddenly caught sight of Zsa Zsa's immense diamond ring, a square-cut gem that covered half her hand. "Gee," snapped Red, "where do you keep the batteies?"

Mickey Novak

"And when I'd open a knitting box," said Doris, "I'd find a circular advertising a hobbyists' home plumbing equipment in the middle of a ball of yarn, or an ad torn from a magazine in my make-up case extolling the qualities of a Handi-mechanic that would buff silver, drill holes in concrete, serve as a barbecue spit and repair shoes. So what do you think I got him for Christmas? A nice silk robe, a gold watch, a polo pony? Not on your life! I got him tools. I didn't dare get anything else."

And there was the time that Marty surveyed the back yard and decided it should be illuminated at night. Like a master landscape architect, he plotted the position of the lights he intended installing—and when he was satisfied that his calculations were correct, he spent hours in the trees and atop the outer buildings stringing wire and bracketing on reflectors. When it was completed Marty went back to business and stayed away long enough one day for Doris to have the job redone by a quiet little man who knew what he was about.

"But ever since," says Doris, "it has been his pride and joy. When we have guests for dinner, Marty doesn't take their coats and escort them to chairs. He snatches at them the minute they enter the front door and charges them to the back yard where he spends ten holy minutes flicking the switch on and off and telling them how the idea originally came to him and why the biggest light is in the tree where it illuminates the rose bushes instead of atop the garage where it would light up a camellia bed."

BUT any woman can tell you that a man is an inconsistent creature. Suddenly, without warning, almost as though a serious illness has left him, a man will fall into an I-don't-care spell. Like, with Marty, the time the door knob came off the front door. For almost a month he would leave in the morning, grasp the knob and have it come off in his hand. Patiently, he would fiddle with it for five minutes until he had the knob back in place just enough so that the door could be opened. Then he would whistle off to work as though everything were in complete order.

These strange, unexpected periods generally end as abruptly as they begin. One evening Marty was reading the paper. Suddenly he sat bold upright, as though he had been stung by a bee. A frantic light came into his eyes and he leaped from his chair yowling for his tools—and although it was a bitter cold night, he held the door open half an hour while he knelt in a perspiring struggle with the obstinate piece of hardware. And he slept well that night, serene in the knowledge that he had successfully once again defeated a threat to the safety of his family and castle.

There were other things in that first year that had to be adjusted. Things that had to be experienced so they could be recognized as part of the life a woman lives with a man. None of them were serious. Things like the irregular hours a man likes to eat—and the frequent disappearances a man will make into a shower with, apparently, a sole purpose—to drain off all the hot water in the house. There were the volley ball teams he organized among the neighborhood kids, which resulted in the Melcher home being turned into a sort of branch YMCA.

BUT it was fun. At the end of the first year, Doris Day could count up 12 months of uncertainty and surprises, but 52 weeks of laughter and happiness.

And with a year under her belt, she could look back on the experiences with a smile and a lump in the throat. What, after all, is closet space and drawer room compared with loneliness? What is a home without a man puttering about ruining the garden walk and facing electrocution installing mazda miracles in the back yard? What is a house without a lanky, serious-faced putterer who leaves holes in the wall and pliers behind the sofa cushions? What is an odor of creosote when you know it comes from a man's desire to "protect" your garden furniture against the tricky weather. It's sweeter than incense ever was!

Doris Day vows it was fun. And she wants a lot more of it. She wants as much of Marty in her home as there is—all of him for all time.

And nowadays when Doris looks out the living room window and sees Marty coming up the walk empty-handed, she wishes he was carrying something, like more suitcases or another armful of clothes. She wishes there was something to fix, because she likes to see him relax that way. And she hopes he'll suggest they go for a ride or shopping, so they can buy a few more gas masks or obsolete bayonet mounts—or maybe hang around a hardware store finding out what's new in the world of mechanical magic.

Ask Doris Day and she'll tell you the first year was fun—and she's looking forward to many more of them with her man around the house. END

STEEL TOWN

When Steel Town puts before our eyes the daily operation of a real—and gigantic—steel mill, it is nothing sort of magnificent. In blazing Technicolor we behold the red, molten steel pouring from the furnaces, the men stoking the furnaces and stepping quickly away from the infernal heat, the derricks carrying steel down the production line for shipment all over the world. All this in Steel Town is vital and strong as steel itself. But when Steel Town gives us the brawling of John Lund and Howard Duff, two tough, handsome Lotharios of the steel mills, for the hand of Ann Sheridan, then it grows small and tiresome. These two chaps, grown men both, are forever squabbling, betting and blacking each other's eyes for love of Ann, cashier in a steel town beanery. And their brawls are generally on the level of childish arguments over what toy belongs to what child. The boys even carry their feuding into the steel mill, though you'd think there'd be too much hard work to allow them much time for such nonsense. Ann, Lund and Duff are three of our most attractive and capable actors but they are swamped by the juvenile antics of the plot, and by the endless stream of cheap wisecracks that pass for dialogue. Steel Town is strictly small time—especially when set against the drama of steel itself. Cast: Ann Sheridan, John Lund, Howard Duff. —Universal-International.

AARON SLICK FROM PUNKIN CRICK

Meet—and love—Aaron Slick, shy country bumpkin, and Josie Berry, the farm lass he woos shyly. Meet—and hiss—Bill Meridew, the dastardly city slicker who nearly comes between Aaron and Josie with his villainous schemes. These three—virtuous farm boy and girl, and the bad man from the big city—are traditional characters in oldtime melodramas, and Paramount has built a droll and engagingly innocent and laughing travesty around them in Aaron Slick From Punkin Crick. The movie keeps the settings and atmosphere of the good old days of 50 or 60 years ago, but dresses the story up with songs, Technicolor, and an impudent, roguish sense of humor. Aaron Slick ribs the evil plotting of Mr. Meridew to gain Josie's farm and her money, but it does so fondly, with a certain obvious affection for all the characters as part of a bygone age in America. You root hard for Aaron and Josie to outsmart Mr. Meridew, for virtue to triumph over wickedness, for Aaron and Josie to live happily ever after in Punkin Crick—because Alan Young is so downright perfect, and keeps you in stitches, with his portrayal of the awkward, slow yet shrewd and lovable Aaron. And Dinah Shore is buxom and lively as Josie. Perhaps Aaron Slick would be more fun if everybody didn't stop to sing so often, or if the Metropolitan Opera's Robert Merrill were more comfortable with the music and skulduggery given him as Mr. Meridew. But when simple farm boy Alan Young is running like sixty from a bull in a meadow, or getting caught accidentally and embarrassingly in the middle of a fast girlie show in a Chicago night club, then there's no doubt—Aaron Slick From Punkin Crick is a scream.
Cast: Alan Young, Dinah Shore, Robert Merrill, Adele Jergens.—Paramount.

CAN THESE

Ravishing Women

HOLD THEIR MEN?

Are they too demanding—too loving or too good? You'll find the answers in these thrilling Dell Books

DARK MOON OF MARCH

by Emmett Gowen

Andrew Neil was a devil with women. Hard fighting, hard drinking and love making were his only occupations until he met and married beautiful Ersie Ragland. Then he reformed, at least temporarily, and settled down as a tenant farmer. But married life was too subdued for him. Andrew still craved a wild life and passionate women. He found both when he met seductive Dove Kennedy. One spree with this temptress led to another until the birth of his second child made him realize that he still had a wife to support. Would he be able to forget Dove now, and the reckless life she stood for? Even if he returned to his wife, could he ever make himself settle down again?

FOR RICHER, FOR POORER

by Faith Baldwin

Love wasn't the only thing that brought Teresa and Chris Russell together. Each one thought the other was wealthy. Their marriage was for profit as well as love. Then on their honeymoon, Chris revealed that he was stone broke and Teresa admitted she was penniless too. Instead of working they chose to live on their reputations. It was easy enough to move from one friend's home to another, sponging off people who knew them only as wealthy socialites. But, Teresa found out that this life was gradually breaking up her marriage. Almost too late she saw that she'd have to convince Chris that their marriage was doomed unless both of them could reform.

ard Keel sent a suit out to be cleaned. It came back washed in soap and water! Rita Hayworth's Affair In Trinidad set was closed to visitors. Her co-star, Glenn Ford, immediately sent out word to newspapermen that he'd be glad to see them in his dressing room . . . When Bette Davis gets mad she REALLY gets mad! The British press was very unkind to her independent picture, Another Man's Poison. So when London critic Logan Gourlay paid a visit to Hollywood during our terrible rainy spell Bette called him and said, "I'm pleased at least that we're giving you some of your own filthy weather." That evening Gourlay returned to his Beverly Hills hotel room to find a greasy parcel awaiting him. It contained two large pieces of meat, a month's ration for a British family. And accompanying it was a note from Bette: "Nibble, nibble, Ferret!" Ouch! . . . Shortly after this incident the long association between Bette and her secretary, Bridget Price, came to a close. They met on the train when Bette first came to Hollywood. Bridget, now in her 70's, has been handling Bette's fan mail ever since . . . Bette shouldn't get excited over what the critics say. She should read the glowing reviews of her acting in Phone Call From A Stranger and relax.

I didn't need a miracle

But Mother didn't reckon with my faith; she only figured in terms of my equipment, natural and acquired:

$10.00 a week
1 female form, suitably (I hoped) proportioned
1 plaid skirt
1 dress
2 white blouses
1 pair brown-and-white spectator shoes
1 set underthings
1 brown shoulder-strap bag (Mother's)
1 comb, 1 toothbrush, 1 pair hose (which soon became zero pair)
1 high school education with thin overlays of hastily absorbed culture (musical voice training, elocution and dramatic courses)
1 great, strong, unswerving faith

That last may seem the most ineffectual item on the list; it turned out to be the most important!

Perhaps I had better explain that I had a very religious childhood. I have not always hewn to that religion, but I have worked out my own philosophy of life, my own ways of worship and devotion. To begin with, I believe everyone is born with faith, but its development is part of the individual's own growth. It must be strengthened constantly, but once it has reached its full development in your own mind, nothing, but nothing can shake it. Faith gives you peace of mind. It holds your head high when everything seems to go against you.

TAKE that skimpy wardrobe of mine, for instance. With the daily tubbings it underwent, it should have been threadbare in a month. I'm still convinced I held it together by sheer faith! I remember washing out my underthings, a dress, a blouse, my hose (while they lasted), then trundling them all down to the basement of the YWCA (where I had a room). There I would slip a dime into the electric iron and be assured of 15 minutes of heat. You've never seen anybody press out a skirt or iron a blouse so fast in your life. I may not have stepped out of the pages of a slick fashion book; but, by golly, I was really cleaned and pressed! This is how my faith helped me—I could be satisfied with one dress because I knew that someday I would have a whole closetful.

When I was "between assignments"—clerking part-time in a lingerie shop, modelling, or any one of those little pick-up jobs I managed to get from time to time—I had to exist on $3.50 a week! That's all I had left from my $10 after I'd paid my room rent. Subway fares and phone calls did make a little dent in the balance, so I really had to scout around for the most inexpensive places to eat. I found one Italian hole-in-the-wall where I got a mountainous plate of good spaghetti for 30 cents! But you can imagine what all that starch did to this girl's figure. It worried the life out of me, because I knew no producer in his right mind was going to hire a bovine-type ingenue! But I was young and healthy—and determined. I could thrive on adversity because I had a sense of destiny.

Oh, I'm not trying to make myself out a dedicated creature; a 20th century Joan of Arc. I'm only human. The going was really rough at times—most times. And there were nights when I had to fight myself to keep from burying my head in the pillow and bawling my heart out. I didn't drop to my knees and pray—I don't worship in that fashion. I feel it in my heart. God is all around us in all ways. If you have ever watched the sun follow its eternal course from east to west; if you have ever seen a tree bud and blossom; or watched the miracle of rain on a thirsty patch of earth, you'll know what I mean.

But there were months on end when I felt trapped in a monotony of "No casting today," "You're the wrong type," "Too young," "Too old," "Not enough experience." I was a bust! That was the long and short of it. My faith had carried me so far, yet it didn't seem capable of getting me over that last big bump of despair. I needed help. Finally I wrote to a favorite aunt of mine who is a nun—Mother Cleta of the Missionary Sisters of the Poor at Columbus Hospital in New York. I knew she would be able to bolster my morale with the same quiet and kindly advice with which she had met some of my adolescent problems a few years before.

She didn't fail me. Her letter came one morning while I was dressing. I read it over several times, allowing her words of encouragement and ageless wisdom to seep in. She made me realize how foolish I had been to let my faith flag. Let us say it was coincidence that I was given my chance to understudy Tallulah Bankhead in Skin of Our Teeth that same afternoon.

Working with Tallulah was an experience few ambitious girls achieve. She is such a brilliant actress, so vivacious, so vital. Her vitality, as a matter of fact, was so great that not once during the entire run of the play did she even get the sniffles! While I did not envy the star, I must confess that like every other understudy in the history of the theater, I used to stand in the wings and pray, "Please let her trip and sprain her ankle—but don't let it hurt!" There was no personal malice in this prayer—just that drive, that desire to become a Broadway actress—even for one night! But even with Miss Bankhead's bouncing health, my faith was once more riding high and giving me strength.

Then, once again, that faith had to be put to the test. On the same day that I was asked to fly to Boston and substitute for Gladys George in the road show of Skin of Our Teeth, I received a message that motion picture producer Hal Wallis, wanted to meet me with a view to signing me to a Hollywood contract. That inner turmoil started again, "Should I blow my chance in Boston for a crack at Hollywood?" I wrestled with that problem until a half hour before plane time, when it suddenly occurred to me that this was the goal I had set for myself; this was the point to which my faith had carried me. On that stage in Boston lay the fulfillment of my hopes and dreams. And I felt that if this Hollywood opportunity were meant to be, Mr. Wallis would approach me again. And, of course, he did.

Perhaps you know faith best when others demonstrate they have faith in you. I had been signed to a contract for Hellzapoppin!, the Olson and Johnson revue. I toured with the show for a year and a half—at $60 a week. That was big-time for the girl who had made $18 a week, some weeks, in the lingerie shop. Hellzapoppin! was no great dramatic offering. It was a loud, boisterous, crazy musical.

When we opened in Pittsburgh, word came to me that an uncle of mine who was a priest, Father Pennock, was coming to see the show—and was bringing six other priests as his guests. I began to get panicky. What in heaven's name would my uncle think of me now? He was the man who had helped and encouraged me so very much during the early years; the man whose faith that someday I would be a great dramatic actress had carried me along. What was he going to think of this "tragedienne," I wondered, going through one crazy skit after another?

AFTER the finale, I went back to my dressing room. And there was Father Pennock with his six colleagues. I wanted to burst into tears. But they were all grinning broadly. They'd loved the show. My uncle was still chuckling over some of the sillier gags. He took my hand and squeezed it. "I always knew you'd make good," he said. "You were wonderful!"

That stopped me for a moment. I had expected disapproval; I had received praise! To him, I guess, I was still the girl he had once kidded because she traveled so far for elocution lessons that it took her four trolley transfers to get there. I was still the girl who would study a poem or piece of dramatic recitation for hours just to entertain him and the rest of the family. I was still the girl whose dreams he had listened to and approved years ago. And he believed in me now as he had then.

A long time ago there was a man who didn't believe in me. He was the director of a play I worked in—and he didn't believe in any of the other people cast in the production, either. He didn't trust us to give our best and decided to "needle" us into a proper intensity by warning each of us, "confidentially," that the others were out to steal all the scenes.

His lack of faith boomeranged badly. He got us into an emotional pitch all right, but we all spent more time watching each other than we did thinking and feeling our parts. As a result, nothing went right, and when we realized his trick, as we had to sooner or later, he was in a personal mess as well as a professional one.

For the past two years I have taken special courses in philosophy and psychology at the University of Southern California. But I can assure you, I haven't done this to become either a philosopher or a psychologist, or because I want to achieve any special honors in these studies. I just want to learn more about myself . . . about the faith that has brought me where I am. Where else can it take me? I think I know. I have always believed in eternal life. My belief comes from my faith, and my faith comes from God. END

(Continued from page 44) briefly before answering my question: "Would you like to play in The End of the Affair?" It seems her mind had to make the connection between her present contented state in Italy with a far away town called Hollywood. I asked a second time for her reaction about The End of the Affair.

"Yes, I've read the book," she said, "but I wouldn't want to do the picture. I'm to start The Witness with my husband directing in September. I'd rather work for him than anyone else."

She didn't say so, but somehow I got the idea that perhaps the part in The End of the Affair too closely paralleled her own life. I know she'd like to forget both Stromboli and all the previously haloed aura cast about her during her life in Hollywood. And The End of the Affair would be certain to refresh the public's memory. Besides, despite constant reports of her rifting with Rossellini, I know she's deeply in love with him and really doesn't care about working with anyone except him.

Ingrid told me she expects her new baby in June. She hopes for a girl. She has chosen no name for it, but, in accordance with Italian law, it will have to be an Italian name. I asked how many babies she planned on having. "Oh, I'll just take them as they come," she laughed. "I don't know how many we'll have."

Then I told her that her daughter Pia had grown into a very beautiful girl and had acquired a lot of boy friends at Hawthorne School in Beverly Hills.

"Oh, that's wonderful," said Ingrid with a hearty laugh.

No trace of concern or wistfulness was in her voice. Obviously she has reconciled herself to the fact that Pia will remain with her father, and she will shed no more tears over the inevitable.

I know that she loves her daughter very much and for a while missed her bitterly while she fought so hard for her custody. But time changes everything, and with the passing years, her little son Robertino will do much to fill the void in his mother's heart.

"Have you any regrets for what you've done?" I asked.

"No," she replied, "I'm a very happy woman."

"How do the Italians treat you?"

"I get the same star treatment on the streets here as I did in Hollywood, and my life is about the same as it was before. We have two homes—one in Rome and another in the country by the sea."

"When I last talked to you you seemed rather bitter towards America because of the way the press handled your love story. Do you still feel the same way?"

"No," was her quick response, "I have no bitterness whatever. How could I have when I'm so happy?"

Then I popped the $64 question. "Have you had any film offers from Hollywood?"

She immediately turned evasive. "I'd rather not go into that subject now," said she.

"Well, let's put it another way then. If you got a really good script and had to come to Hollywood to make the picture, would you do it?"

"No," she replied without any hesitation. "Why should I when I have everything I want right here."

Then I added, "You sound so happy, I think I'd better come over there and marry an Italian."

She laughed and said, "If you're serious I'll find one for you." And that was the end of our conversation.

But as I always say, once an actress—always an actress. Once it's in you, it stays. Babies come and babies go, but art goes on forever. Tossing a good script to an actor is like handing a lump of sugar to a horse. In both instances, the power of resistance is mighty low. However, I believe that Ingrid is really frightened of our town. The vicinity of her ex-husband and daughter would certainly produce some awkward situations, and the disenchanted press would no longer stand in awe of her.

WHEN Ingrid Bergman was at the peak of her popularity in Hollywood, she was guarded like a rare jewel. Interviews, if granted at all, had the tenor of a royal gift; and contacting her on the telephone was well nigh impossible. She was surrounded by a solid wall of human beings—press agents, secretaries, servants, and David O. Selznick. It seemed that each wanted to acquire his priority on the star by giving her advice—much of it bad. I suppose that each one thought they had to earn their salaries some way.

At studio request, I sent an assistant to interview her while she was making Arch of Triumph. Ingrid was at the height of her fame, though she didn't know it. With Charles Boyer as her co-star and a picture based on an Eric Remarque book, everyone thought the film couldn't miss. It had to be great. Ingrid was treated like a queen. My assistant had to interview her while she was making herself up and examining costumes. Her former press agent paced nervously about the room and suggested that the interview would be closed immediately if it got tiring or annoying to Miss Bergman. My assistant would have left right then had not Ingrid ignored the press agent and remained her gracious self.

In view of what has since happened, it is interesting to note that Ingrid was quite concerned about what her native Swedish fans would think of her playing the role of a fallen woman. The picture, despite all of its assets, proved to be a notorious flop. Ingrid tried Joan of Arc next.

My same assistant visited the set, interviewed other actors, but deliberately skipped the star. He didn't want to annoy her with such a triviality as publicity. Finally her same press agent came up to him and inquired anxiously, "Aren't you going to talk to Ingrid?" Looking surprised, my man said, "Oh, do you think she'd be willing to talk to the press?" The agent assured him, "She'd love to talk to you."

Since he had not set eyes on Ingrid since the days of Arch of Triumph, he couldn't understand what he'd done to ingratiate himself with the Swedish star. He came to the sad conclusion, however, that there's nothing more dismal than a fading star—unless it's the job of selling a picture in which ten million dollars have been invested with no certainty of returns.

He talked to Ingrid and found her as gracious as she'd been on the previous occasion. But there was no mention of ending the interview by the press agent. He was typical of the people surrounding her during her Hollywood sojourn, and I think her fans, to understand her life today, should know about them.

During World War II, I volunteered to get stars to appear one night each week to work in the Canteen kitchen, signing autographs, or entertaining the G.I.'s. On one occasion I called the Selznick studio to get Ingrid for an appearance when another star had dropped out because of illness. The response I received was vague and completely unsatisfactory. So, tired of waiting for a yes or no, I got Ingrid on the phone.

Her answer was, "What time shall I be there, and what shall I wear?"

Later I tried to get her to appear at a benefit we were giving in Harold Lloyd's garden for the Nursery School for Visually Handicapped Children. Ingrid's personal telephone number had been changed, but I left a message which I feel sure was never delivered to her. She lived just across the road from the Lloyd estate and was one of the few important stars who wasn't at the benefit. Ingrid loves kids, and I think she would have been very proud to lend a hand in raising $65,000 in one afternoon for many blind children.

While she was playing in Joan of Lorraine on the New York stage I attended the annual publishers convention in that city. I tried to invite her to the annual big party given by the New York Daily News for important editors and publishers from all over the nation. She could have won the hearts of all of them, I'm sure; but I couldn't get through to her. There was the same press agent barring the way. Later when the Stromboli story broke, those same gentlemen of the press might have handled it more kindly had they had the opportunity of meeting her at the convention.

Although she practically became a legend, Ingrid was never a mystery to those who knew her and looked at her realistically. In Hollywood, she was honest and forthright, sometimes contradicting herself, but not unduly shy. After seeing her in Intermezzo over ten years ago, I wrote in my column, "She has a unique charm—child one moment, emotional woman the next. A sort of sophisticated novice." I have since had little reason to change my opinion.

I KNOW that she was very lonely when she first came here. She kept a picture of her daughter, Pia, pasted in her make-up kit and cried every day. A friend of mine used to find her wandering around alone at night on the foggy streets of Culver City. He warned her that the practice was dangerous. "But I'm so lonely," she insisted, "and there's nothing else to do. All my friends are so far away."

I'm convinced now that her marriage to Dr. Peter Lindstrom was never as happy as it was touted to be. So she buried herself in acting. "Hollywood is the best place in the world to work," she once said to me, "because there's nothing else to do here." I've noticed that she's expressed no undue anxiety to do pictures since marrying Rossellini and living in Italy.

She explained to me why she insisted on keeping her husband's name out of her interviews. "He's in the medical profession," said she, "and it's unethical to involve a doctor in publicity." Yet, when Rossellini came along, she involved Dr. Lindstrom in headlines that Hollywood's most fantastic imagination could not have dreamed up. A member of the Stromboli crew told me that she and Rossellini, while making the picture, acted as naturally and naïvely as children, giving no thought to the fact that their names were making headlines together.

I have argued with her until I was practically blue in the face that one could not be a movie star without living in a goldfish bowl. She never got what I was driving at or at least did not admit it.

When she was making Joan of Arc, we had a long session in her dressing room. "After coming here, I didn't understand English very well and gave out statements that the newspapers misinterpreted," she said. "That's one reason I avoid interviews now." "Well, you understand English perfectly now," I answered. "And do you believe in this picture?" She looked at me in a surprised manner, saying, "With all my heart. I've wanted to play Joan ever since I was a little girl." I told her then that if she believed in the picture, if it meant that much to her, she ought to help publicize it so that everybody in the country would know about it. She stared into space, still seeming not to get my point.

I saw her last in Rome; and she was boiling mad at the Italian papers. That day one of them had announced she was expecting a baby. She was living in a nondescript apartment which I had to climb four flights of stairs to reach. Ingrid, without make-up or stockings, was wearing a plain blue cotton dress and pacing the floor like an enraged animal when I entered. As she cried out against the world that was flaying her for her unconventional actions with Rossellini, she used profanity, which I'd never heard her do before. "Americans think they own me. But I have my own life to live. Is it a sin to fall in love?"

This was a question she alone could answer. "It's your problem, and you've got to face it," was all I could say to her. Then she became even more illogical. "But I've been a good wife, not an actress with a long record of romances," she argued.

"That's just it," said I. "The world bought you as a dream. You smashed it. Now people are mad, thinking they've been duped."

Then I asked Ingrid the truth about her expecting a child. She denied it. The date was August 9, 1949, but the rumor was spreading all over Europe, so I, being on the job as a reporter, put it in my column as such. Some months later, a few days before the Christmas holidays, the story broke into the headlines.

Hedy Lamarr tells it. She was shopping in a market on Schlepp Row when the clerk said to her, "Did anyone ever tell you that you look like Hedy Lamarr?" "Yes," she replied hesitantly, "several people have." "Oh," apologized the clerk, "I don't mean the way she looks now."

Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

In Beverly Hills, Ingrid had been a neighbor of mine, living less than a block from me on a hilltop home that had originally been built as a playhouse. I was present on a New Year's Eve when the place was christened. We sang Irish songs and square-danced. Everybody had a wonderful time.

When Ingrid bought the place, she made many additions, but I never heard of her giving a big party there. No wonder she thought Hollywood was dull. She engaged so little in our social life. While his wife was in New York with Joan of Lorraine, Dr. Lindstrom added a swimming pool to their grounds and had the whole place enclosed by a wire fence 12 feet high. One no longer dropped in on Ingrid as a neighbor. That fence was there, forbidding and uninviting. But Ingrid was a free soul; and nothing—no person or steel wall—was going to hem her in. Her wings would not be clipped.

I'm not passing moral judgment on Ingrid. That's for her and her conscience to decide. I've had many letters on the case. Some say: "Bravo for the girl who had the courage to follow the dictates of her own heart despite public opinion." Others say, "Let her stay in Italy. We don't want her."

Certainly we can not forget moral discipline and set her up as an example for our youth. But are we to continue condemning her when she has tried after her original indiscretion, to conform to society's dictates in her search for happiness? There will always be two schools of thought on that as long as the affair is discussed. And only the public can determine the future of her career.

If people go to see her pictures, she may come back stronger than ever. If they don't she'll be through as a film star. The final judgment lies with the public, as always.

"If it had been anybody but Ingrid," I've heard people say with a sad shake of the head, as if a holy idol had fallen. They either forget or do not know that she never aspired to saintliness. It was a cloak that publicity and fans had wrapped around her; and the measure didn't fit. "I'm first and last a mother and a wife," she told a writer in explaining why she had to have dinner with her family even when working in pictures. Some may say, "A fine mother and wife she proved to be! Didn't she desert her husband and daughter?" Others might say, "Well, isn't she a faithful wife and mother now?" There's the enigma.

I think The Bells Of St. Mary, more than any other picture, served to build that saintly legend about Ingrid; and I connived with Leo McCarey to get her into the film. Very often an actress, through sheer talent, carries the impression she gives in a role into her private life as the public sees her. That's what Ingrid did with Bells. She would never have done that picture without Leo McCarey's persistence and help from Hopper. David Selznick was supposed to star her in The Scarlet Lily, but never got around to making it.

But when Ingrid read in my column that Leo wanted her opposite Bing Crosby in Bells, she acted characteristically. She didn't beat around the bush. She was extremely anxious to play a nun. So she went directly to Leo and got the part. And she had a serious quarrel with David Selznick about it. Finally he agreed, but only after it cost Leo McCarey $450,000 for her services.

An apt person she was for it, too. Ingrid was one of the first to break down the pattern of movie glamor girls who thought looking like the next star was a prime requisite for film success. She used little makeup, usually applied it herself. On her first return to Sweden, Ingrid told me, all the actresses were eager to hear what she'd learned about makeup in America. She told them, "Nothing. I still do my own." So naturally they thought she was getting nowhere in pictures.

A publicity man working on Intermezzo cast about for a word to describe her appearance and came up with "translucent beauty." The term, arrived at in such a haphazard manner, was fitting then as it is today. Her skin has a warm, healthy glow, as if fed from some inner fire, and that added to the saintly legend.

WHEN Ingrid came to Hollywood, girls were made to appear synthetic princesses. They were short on royalty, but long on synthetic qualities. Their hair carried too much bleach, too much wave, their faces too much makeup. The false eyelashes were too long, the lips oversized instead of natural. But the queens of the cinema, supposedly women apart, had to look different from ordinary human beings. Or so they thought.

Then along came Ingrid who wouldn't fall for this line of guff. Depending upon her natural good looks, she dusted her well-scrubbed face with some powder, applied a small amount of lipstick, and was ready for the camera. She didn't need fabulous costumes. She looked better in a simple skirt and blouse with a scarf tied casually around her neck. Yet Ingrid was a director's dream. She could be photographed from any angle and always looked good. The late director Victor Fleming called her "bullet proof."

I don't think Ingrid ever quite grew up and that was part of her charm. She hated being stared at, yet she confessed to me she couldn't help staring at other celebrities. "I don't think I'm important as a person," she once said to me, "but my work as an actress is." That was the basis of her naïve conclusion that she could quit being a movie star when she stepped off a sound stage; a conclusion that got her into much trouble. Rossellini was somewhat of the same opinion. Both simply refused to believe that one couldn't shed fame as one does clothes. But they're learning; and they're acquiring a respect for the awful power of the press and aroused public opinion.

Right now Ingrid feels an essential security in Rossellini's presence. He was a party to her sin, if such it was, and I don't believe she'd feel at ease working with another director, especially if Rossellini weren't beside her.

Hollywood producers will star almost anyone if they feel he'll be good box-office. So the real question in their minds is whether the American public will go for Ingrid or not. They're being cautious, and are waiting to see the reception given Europe, 1951, the film Ingrid did with Rossellini, before going all out to get her back. Nobody can deny she's a fine actress, but American movie-goers are peculiar people.

I think Ingrid would willingly come back if she were certain that the American public wanted her. She wants us to like her again, but not in a saintly manner. She prefers being regarded as a woman with normal faults and desires. She's learned at last, whether she likes it or not, that she's a public figure. But the one thing that would bring her back to Hollywood causing her to sacrifice her pride, is contained in her statement to me: "I'm only important as an actress—as a person, no."

END

We just learned the origin of Ingrid Bergman's daughter's name—Pia. It means (meant) Peter-Ingrid-Always.

crazy like a fox

On tour, Dean goes to bed while Jerry stays up all hours of the night rehearsing with the orchestra. Jerry not only goes through his own routines but Dean's as well! Dean usually manages to arrive five minutes before the show goes on. One time when they were playing the Paramount in New York, Dean forgot to turn up at all! Jerry sweated out a solo. Five minutes later Dean strolled on stage wearing blue denims, sneakers, and a smile, all nice and relaxed.

"I'm ten years older than Jerry," Dean, who is 34, told me at a party last week (actually Jerry is nine years younger). "But," he added, "I feel ten years younger. I wake up every morning saying 'Gee, Dean, it's wonderful to be alive.' I leave the worrying to Jerry. He loves to do it, so I let him. If it's okay with him, it's okay with me." The only time it isn't okay with Dean is when Jerry makes a date that takes him away from the golf course.

To Women With Nagging Backache

Nagging backache, loss of pep and energy, headaches and dizziness may be due to slowdown of kidney function. Doctors say good kidney function is very important to good health. When some everyday condition, such as stress and strain, causes this important function to slow down, many folks suffer nagging backache—feel miserable. Minor bladder irritations due to cold or wrong diet may cause getting up nights or frequent passages.

Don't neglect your kidneys if these conditions bother you. Try Doan's Pills—a mild diuretic. Used successfully by millions for over 50 years. It's amazing how many times Doan's give happy relief from these discomforts—help the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters flush out waste. Get Doan's Pills today!

The first inkling I had that Jerry was the entire business shebang in the partnership was when I first interviewed Dean and Jerry in the Paramount Studio cafe.

"What is your next picture?" I asked them. Dean immediately strummed an imaginary ukulele, after Jerry jumped on the table, made like he was a cross-eyed monkey and lisped, "Why am I so attractive to women?" Before I could answer, someone pushed a big sheet of paper in front of Jerry. Talk about Jekyll and Hyde! The change from monkey to executive took exactly one-tenth of a second. For ten serious minutes Jerry made suggestions and additions for the advertising campaign for their new movie, while Dean ate his lunch and smiled at me between bites. When the man with the paper was gone, the kidding resumed.

Jerry never clowns until the business is finished. But when it is, he goes all the way. Once, on his way out of a Paramount office, he sat down in Barney Balaban's secretary's chair, pressed the inter-office phone button and told her boss "Get your notebook, kid, and come out and take dictation."

Another day I heard him shout to Y. Frank Freeman in the Paramount cafe, "I thought I told you to wash my car this morning!" Mr. Freeman, President of Paramount, was entertaining Sir Anthony Eden at the time!

LAST year Martin and Lewis made a million dollars each. This year the take will be higher. And if Jerry were the boasting type, which he isn't, he could say "I get the medal." When Jerry told Dean of the gigantic eight-million-dollar deal with NBC for television and radio, Dean said, "Just send the money to the house." Jerry signs every check for business expenditures. Dean never asks who to or how much.

Before signing the fabulous contract, Jerry, who thinks of everything, inserted an unusual clause—"time out for a nervous breakdown"! It's all in there, seven weeks off every year for a possible nervous breakdown. Came in handy last year when Jerry collapsed from overwork.

Dean calls Jerry "Little Mother Hen." But a mother hen forgets the chick when it can scratch for itself. Not this one. With the scratch goes a hundred per cent protection. When they're on the road, Jerry sees to it that Dean is not disturbed when he is resting. All the telephone calls are channeled through Jerry's room. And this can be murderous. When stars of the caliber of Martin and Lewis hit a town, everyone tries to call them from the mayor to the mademoiselle on the corner.

When they travel by train, Jerry gets up an hour before Dean is even awake, to get the baggage assembled, breakfast ordered and to attend to all the bits and pieces of detail that go with getting off a train with a traveling company.

In arranging the tours, Jerry never forgets to make it possible for Dean to fly back to his family for a quick visit on Sundays. And his press agent, Jack Keller, has to call ahead in each town to be sure there is a telephone in Dean's theater dressing room so he can phone wife Jean between numbers. No phone for Jerry—he's too busy taking care of everything and everyone, to call during a show.

But when Jerry was resting (supposedly) in Arizona recently, he remembered to call Dean in Hollywood to remind him of an appointment with the tailor for a new tuxedo! The mortality rate of Martin and Lewis clothes is high—think of their shows and you'll see what I mean. Jerry's wife Patti swears her mate owns a thousand pairs of socks, hundreds of bow ties and so many suits, there are some he bought a few years back he hasn't gotten around to wearing yet.

NEVER fight with Dean unless you want to take on Jerry, too. "If anyone hurts my partner, he's my enemy," I heard Jerry tell a columnist who picked on Dean when they first came to Hollywood.

This actually happened. When Dean and Jerry were in Georgia for the start of Jumping Jacks, Jerry decided that his role over-shadowed Dean's. He called Hal Wallis, and told him "You build up his part or I walk off the picture."

And when Lou Costello sued and settled with Dean for lending him money early in his career to fix his nose—which Dean insisted he had already paid back, you'd have thought it was skin off Jerry's nose, he was so mad. When Lou, who forgets a fight easily, asked for Martin and Lewis on his TV show, Jerry's "No!" was heard all over Hollywood.

You somehow don't expect a comic to be methodical. Most of them are up on a cloud of gags. But this Mr. Lewis has a pigeon-hole mind. Everything is catalogued. Every news clipping, every magazine story ever written about them, is somewhere in the 180 leather-bound volumes in Jerry's library. Every radio show (their own and guest shots) is transcribed and arranged according to date. Jerry has a kinescope of every television show he has ever done, including a guest shot on mine (that was a collector's item!). He has a 16mm print of every one of his movies. Every movie and radio script is bound between leather covers with gold-letter titling. Jerry has a complete list of every play date, the attendance in each theater, the weather in each town at the time, and how much money they made. You can call Jerry at any time and ask, "Where were you on such and such a night, what was the weather like, who did you see and how much did you make?" All he has to do is look it up in his amazing library, and he can reply in a matter of minutes.

Janet Leigh only needs three months work to get her college degree. She was an honor student at College of the Pacific when she left to accept a movie contract.

With so much to do, Jerry cannot waste time. Although he hasn't yet gotten around to saving much money, he doesn't believe in wasting that, either. You've probably heard of his home made movies. He has some wonderful casts: Janet Leigh, Tony Curtis, Shelley Winters, Farley Granger. But the entire production never costs more that three or four thousand dollars. That's cheap for a movie that runs 40 minutes with sound and music.

Talking of the music. When Jerry invited Hal Wallis to see his home-grown Re-Inforcer, Wallis said to Jerry, "I can't quite place the music, but it's very familiar." "Sure is," grinned Jerry, "I borrowed the music track from The Furies—your picture, remember?" He took the expensive score from Sunset Boulevard for his hilarious Fairfax Avenue.

Jerry's camera equipment is insured for $75,000. This is his big hobby. But even a hobby has to pay off for Jerry. One day soon he will direct as well as star with Dean in pictures and TV.

Jerry is delighted with his ability to make money—it's not every young man of 25 who can earn one million dollars per annum. I'd say he is the only one. But he never has thrown it around. He used to rent the Maria Montez home in Beverly Hills and almost bought it—except for the price, $90,000. "I could sign a check for the whole amount," he told me gleefully at the time. "But it's too much to pay." So he bought a house for $75,000, with a big pool and playroom where he shows his movies to very select audiences.

Dean wouldn't know how much money he has, in the bank or in the business (the boys are incorporated in a capital gains set-up under the name "York Productions"). But Dean is an easy touch. Tell him you need it, and he won't ask why; he'll just delve into his wallet and if it's there, it's all yours.

One of the big problems of any popular act is to get the people out of the theater so that new paying customers can come in. If you can't get 'em out, you make no profit. When Dean and Jerry appeared at the Paramount, the kids came in the morning with their lunch and munched through five shows. There is no law that can turn them out. Jerry solved this one too, and it is now standard procedure with all popular acts. As you know, he sent word to the kids to come around backstage, "and we'll put on another show from our dressing room." While Dean and Jerry clowned and threw down hats, ties and coats, a new audience and new money filled the theater.

Six years ago, when Dean and Jerry were new in the business, they put their signatures to everything and anything. "Just show us a piece of paper and we'd sign," Jerry told me. This brought them a lot of trouble, especially lawsuits. Dean used to say "I'm the best dressed man in town. I have 50 suits—all pending."

So Jerry made a new rule—they won't sign anything without an okay from their lawyer. This can be very irritating—to other people. A magazine was on a deadline with a byline story by Dean and Jerry. They couldn't go to press without a signed release. "See my lawyer," persisted Jerry. The lawyer was out of town. The magazine had to yank the story.

"IF we ever fade," says Jerry the worrier, "we may as well take care now of the ones we love." And he does mean their relatives. Dean has an uncle—Leonard Barr, half of the dance team of Barr-Estes, kickabout dances. They kickabout on every playbill with Dean and Jerry. Jerry has a cousin on his payroll. His father is a singer. Jerry makes sure personally that his father gets good bookings.

Jerry seems to have inherited his worrisome nature from his mother. When I wrote in my column about Jerry's bad health last year, I received a sizzling letter from Jerry's ma that nearly burned in my hands. I apologized to her then and now for causing her anxiety. But a reporter has to be objective and report the news.

Both Dean and Jerry are great family men, they love their homes, their wives and their children. Jerry has two boys, Gary, seven, and Ronnie, two. Dean has five altogether—four from his first marriage. Dean likes nothing better than to stay home evenings, playing with the baby on the floor, while his pretty blonde wife relaxes.

Jerry, more gregarious, brings people home all the time. And it's lucky that Patti loves him, because Jerry has no idea of food and how much it takes to feed unexpected guests. Like the time dinner was planned for six and Jerry showed up with four extra people. Patti, who had prepared one small duck, corralled him in the kitchen and really told him off. "What's the excitement?" Jerry demanded. "So just put more stuffing in the duck!" But he'll never do that again. Because home is the one place which Jerry lets someone else run. Mrs. Lewis. Which proves again how smart Mr. Lewis is! END

"now I can talk"

(Continued from page 55) people. He knew he spoke the dese-dem-dose lingo of New York's Lower East Side, and he was afraid people would criticize his speech.

"But I've gotten over that," he said. "I've found that people don't like you because of the way you speak or cut your hair or turn your collar. They like you if you want to be liked.

"I didn't know that when I was a kid." He threw the switch again and the train tore down the track. "I needed friendship, too, but I never had it. And you know something? I still need friendship. Everybody does. That's why Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin and I started the Gar-Ron Club, which is a combination of the names of Jerry's children, Garry and Ronnie. We make home movies, shoot pool, play golf and tennis, swim, go off on picnics—all that kind of jive.

"Well, I came to a brand new place—Hollywood—and I wanted to be liked. Somebody at U-I once told me, 'Kid, I want you to go out and pick me up a right-handed punching bag.' Well, I knew there's no such thing but I went out and pretended to look for it anyway. Why? Because this is a strange new place to me, and I don't know these people too well, and if one of them enjoys this kind of thing at my expense it's the least I can do to gain his friendship.

"Should I go up to him and say, 'Who are you trying to shove around, wise guy?' Of course not. If this is the kind of thing this guy does for kicks, let him have his kicks. And if another actor makes fun of the way I talk, let him be my guest. Let's all enjoy ourselves. You know something? It's a small price to pay for a little affection, love and friendship."

I had known all this about Tony long ago, when he hadn't been able to express himself on the subject so well. Humility is a basic trait with him.

"My business is acting," Tony continued. "I want to do it more than anything else in the world, and do it well. I knew I was limited, at first, because I talked out of the corner of my mouth, and this made me afraid. Suppose I had gotten temperamental when the breaks started coming my way, and coming, miraculously, despite my defects? Suppose I'd started throwing my weight around, like some stars do? Then the people at the studio would have started talking behind my back and the next thing you know columnists would have been printing stories about an incompetent so-and-so like me kicking up his heels, and I'd be through. No, one fault was enough, without piling another on top of it.

"Then I met Janet. Because she loves me, and because I love her, I have the security I lacked when I was a kid. I'm able to go to work in the morning now and not be afraid."

"Afraid? I never suspected it," I said.

"It's true," said Tony. "An accent is a tough thing to iron out. But Janet has given me self-confidence. I know that whatever happens to me from now on, whatever calamity befalls—if people don't go to see my pictures or if nobody comes to interview me for a movie magazine, or whatever—that my wife will always be there when I come home at night, and she'll kiss me and say, 'Come on in, Tony, and have dinner, and then we'll watch the fights on TV, or you can play with your train.'

"Security is what does it—the security of a loving wife, of a home, and of friends. That's what really counts."

Then all of a sudden it was 1941—eleven years ago!—and Tony was 15 years old, and he and I were in a factory in New York City. He was acting it all out for me, and, although this Saturday morning of our interview was a coolish one in Westwood Village, I could feel the heat of that sticky, humid summer afternoon on the Lower East Side and see and smell the grimy factory in which Tony worked.

"I had been a counselor at a camp in the Catskills earlier that summer," he said, "but the job didn't pan out for some reason or other—I really don't remember exactly why—and I got back to New York broke. I had to have a job. I read the want ads. One said, 'Boys wanted between 15 and 18 for summer work.'

"It was a broom factory. They picked six of us out of a big gang of kids and put us to work for $12 a week. My job was to stand at a high desk-like machine and run the uneven brushes through a cutter as they came off the assembly line, to even them off. The cutter jabbed away at my knuckles and nails and made them bleed.

"It couldn't get hotter than it was in that place. I was drenched with sweat—and blood! But the foreman watched us like a hawk, and if we took a break and stayed away for a few seconds longer than he thought was absolutely necessary he would poke us in the back of the neck when we got back and snarl, 'Whaddya think we're running around here—a kindergarten? Keep workin', kid, keep workin'.

"Nights, when I got home, I was ready to kill anybody or anything. I could still feel him poking me and telling me to keep working. I got to hate that man.

"And yet, now that I look back at it, I've got plenty to thank him for, too. I think if he was around now I'd give him five percent of my salary, because he provided me with a drive—a drive to better myself. Some impulses are based on hate, I guess, and maybe it's healthy and maybe it isn't, but that foreman—and, I suppose, my environment—prodded me into trying to make something of myself. Whether I've achieved something big or not is another question, of course, but you've got to admit I've bettered myself—at least to the extent of making $400 a week against that original $12. And it'll be much more soon, I hope, because I'm due for a raise. But $400 isn't an awful lot, all things considered, is it? Only $230 of that is take-home pay. The rest goes for taxes. And I give my folks $100 a week and live on $130. We live frugally, Janet and I, as you can see. But it's still a lot better than a cold water flat and a factory, isn't it?"

I had to agree. The phone rang. He answered it. "Hungarian Underground!" he announced. "Janie? I love you I love you I love you—"

The words rushed together, just like that. No periods, and accent on the word "love." I got out of the room while he talked to his wife, although he beckoned me to stay.

When he called me back in, five minutes later, he said, "She loves me too. Where were we? Oh, yes—

"I've just finished making Flesh and Fury at U-I. I play a deaf mute boxer. Joe Pevney, who used to be an actor, directed it. And, because he was an actor, he inspired me. He's not the kind of director who worries about camera angles. Instead, he sat me down before each scene and gave me a reason for everything I did. As a result, I didn't stand around looking dopey like I've done in other pictures. I've enjoyed this one more than any of the other pictures I've made because of him.

"I got such a shock when Joe would say, 'Tony, how do you feel about this scene?' I got chills up and down my spine, because I kept thinking, 'I'm being considered—I'm being asked for my opinion! Mama, you should only be here and see what's happening! Somebody is asking for my opinion— and eleven years ago I was working in a broom factory! It breaks down to $600 a minute to make a picture, and Joe Pevney is taking time out, Mama, to ask your little Tony's opinion!'

"I met a lot of established actors when I first came to Hollywood. Some of them fluffed me off and I was hurt because, as I said in the beginning, I wanted to be liked. But then I kept getting better and better parts. And those same actors don't fluff me any more.

"Nowadays I run into kids who are just starting in the business and they seem to be afraid I'm going to fluff them too, but I don't. I make it a point not to. And please don't make me sound conceited when you write this. Naturally, I don't go out of my way to fawn on people, because I'm no different than anybody else. You can't like everybody. Nobody can. But when I meet some young actors that I like I try to be nice to them, just as I hoped those established actors would be nice to me three or four years ago.

"I think I can truthfully say I've never been envious of anyone. I've found it difficult enough to worry about my own personal life and development as a human being and my career without worrying about six other actors and how they are doing. If they do well, more power to them. This is what they want, and let me sidestep here a little to say that my favorites of them all are Marlon Brando, for his uninhibited wildness and because people see him in movies and wish they could go up to their bosses and tell them where to get off like Marlon does; Cary Grant and Laurence Olivier, because they're such great artists and make it a real joy to watch them; and Jerry Lewis, because he's the funniest performer in the world."

TONY loves his folks inordinately, and they keep cropping up in his conversation. But now I was pinning him down about the people who had helped his Hollywood career most, and he said there were eight of them. "I'm not including my folks," he said, "because—well, because this is the way they are:

"Before I married Janet I went to my father for his blessing, and he said, 'Kid, I don't care who you marry as long as you're happy. Just be honest.' How could you help but like people like that? So let's stick to my Hollywood career. These are the eight people who've helped me the most out here:

"First, Janet, because, although she's younger than I and hasn't been around as much she's, well, she's the transformer of my electric train, let's say. She motivates me. And she's kind and considerate and understanding.

"Second, Jerry Lewis, who gave me confidence when I needed it. He kept saying, 'You've got talent, Bernie. Work at it. Develop it.'

"Third, George Rosenberg, my agent, who loaned me money when I was flat broke but has never yet taken a cent of commission! I'll pay him back, of course, when I'm making more money under a new contract that's coming up. It's not the studio's fault that I'm not making more money. After all, they took me when I was an unknown and made a star out of me. My raises keep going right along, in the natural course of events.

"And George has done other things, too. When my father had a heart attack George saw to it that he had a private room in the hospital and took my mother to see him every day. He also bought me a TV set at cost, gave me a jacket, and called me into his office to encourage me whenever the going got rougher than usual.

"Fourth, Bill Goetz. People will say, 'Well, Tony's got to say something nice about Bill Goetz because Bill Goetz runs the studio.' But this isn't true. Bill called me into his office, too, to watch the World Series with him. And he came on the set and said, 'Tony, if you have any little problem at all come and see me about it. You're an important property here at Universal, your pictures are going over big, you've been a nice boy, and we appreciate it. Thank you very much.'

"How do you like that for the head of a studio? And when I pass him on the lot he calls out, 'Hi ya, pal,' and I holler back, 'Hi, buddy.' You know how tough it is to run a studio, but Bill Goetz has time to stop and say hello to everybody. He's a real sweet, wonderful man.

"Fifth, Al Horwits, head of publicity. He could push a lot of people but has picked me out and pushed my career tremendously. Another wonderful guy.

"Sixth and seventh, Leonard and Bob Goldstein. Bob discovered me in New York and Leonard, his twin brother, gave me my first starring role, in The Prince Who Was A Thief.

"Eighth, Sophie Rosenstein of the talent department. She worked night and day with me, helping me to straighten out my speech and giving me dramatic lessons.

"And those are the top eight. Now, you've noticed I've mentioned everybody who heads a department. But there are plenty of others, who hold less important jobs at the studio, who've helped me. Wonderful publicity people like Betty Mitchell, Jean Bosquet and, most of all, Frank McFadden, who explained to me at the very beginning all about the studio, how it works, what it's like to be an employee in a big industry, the responsibilities not only to yourself but to the people you work with. And how, if something is upsetting you, you go to somebody in charge who can help you solve your problem and not take it out on somebody who doesn't understand it, as I've heard some players are apt to do.

"Then there's Sol, the studio barber, who lectures me while he cuts my hair. Things were going well with me one day and I was feeling cocky. He took a look at me and said, 'Tony, you seem like a nice boy. And that's important. But you know what, Tony? Something else is important too. Stay a good boy always!' I've never forgotten that, because it seemed so important to Sol that things should stay good and nice in this tough racket.

"And Johnny, the cop at the gate. He let me sneak a friend from New York past the gate a few years ago. My friend wanted to see the back lot. Johnny showed me that even though you're tied down by rules you can break one now and then for a friend, and none the wiser. This releases you and teaches you not to take your job too seriously.

"The boys in the studio gym have been true blue, too. Whitey Egbert, the trainer, has taught me that if you believe in something you should believe in it all the way. Don't give up for anything. Here's how Whitey is: if you're arguing with him and he doesn't like what you're saying he puts up his hand to warn you to stop and then turns off his hearing aid. He has also taught me not to get too carried away with myself.

"And Frankie Van, who runs the gym, let me work on the cuff when I couldn't afford to pay him $10 a month for using his facilities.

"Bob Laszlo is another pal of mine. He's a prop man. He taught me to put things away. I used to leave props lying around and he would pick up after me. He said, 'I don't care how important a star you become, you've got to learn to be nice and put things away. The little things are important, Tony. Stars are important, sure. But the little guy who works behind the camera makes a big contribution, too, and all these things together make one picture. And I don't care how smart you are, Tony, or how big you become, there are certain rules that a real person observes.'

"I've heard of stars who say, 'What do prop men know about a star's problems?' They know plenty, believe me! They've been around a long time, longer than a lot of stars that you never hear about any more. Bob, for instance, came up to me on the set one day and said, 'Tony, I saw you do that scene. It was very good. But don't you think you should feel it?'

"He felt there was something lacking in my acting. And he was right! I had been doing everything else perfectly, but I hadn't been throwing myself into the scene, feeling it like Bob knew, from long experience, I should be feeling it. And I was flattered that Bob had singled me out to share his knowledge with me."

Tony was playing with his train again. It was nice to hear about the people he liked, I said. Now how about the people he disliked?

"Why lie about it? There are a lot of people I dislike," he said. "I dislike the same percentage of people that any other normal human being dislikes. If I said I didn't I'd be a liar.

"I dislike certain people for being vicious. That's the unforgivable sin, in my eyes. I don't like people who come up to me and say, 'Tony, you were great in your last picture,' and then knife me. It's happened more than once, and when I know they've told somebody else I'm not so hot I look them right in the eye and say, 'Why do you do this to me? You talk behind my back and then tell me how great I am to my face. Why?' That stops 'em!

"Then there are the people who say, 'Kid, the reason that certain deal worked out for you was because I put in a good word for you'—and all the time you know they're lying. And the ones who never stop reminding you that you'd never be where you are if it wasn't for them.

"Probably the most disheartening of all are some of your old friends who imagine you've forgotten them simply because you've become a star. Some of them actually seem to get a perverse delight out of the thought that you're too important for them now. But when you're with them and try to act as naturally as you did in the old days they accuse you of patronizing them.

"I got one letter from an old friend that illustrates perfectly what I mean. He was my closest boyhood buddy—in fact, my only buddy. We were so close that one day we cut our fingers with knives and held them together so that our blood mingled. We swore then and there that we were blood brothers for ever and ever.

"So what happens? I'm here two years and I get a letter: 'Dear Tony—or should I call you Bernie?—I wonder if you'll remember me?'

"It threw me off my feed for a whole week. People seem to think that if you're a success the most important requisite is that you forget your old friends. Actually, they must think very little of you to imagine that just because you're doing well you'll forget them. Do I make myself clear?"

"Perfectly."

He knit his brows and thought a while. "I've been very fortunate," he said, finally. "And some day, if it ever blows up, I'll think nothing of going back and opening a shoe shine parlor in the Bronx—if I can find a good spot and saying, 'Okay, I've had it—I've touched success. And now I'm happy.'"

Janet phoned again, just then. The "I love you I love you I love you" routine began. Then, "Okay, honey, knockwurst and beans for dinner, and you'll cook 'em. I love you I love you I love you. Real crazy!"

He hung up with a smile on his face and winked at me. END

"I picked up the trick of using gay posters to liven drab rooms when I was working for Billy Rose at the Diamond Horseshoe in New York," Virginia explains. "I used to room with other show girls in pretty miserable apartments. No matter how bad they looked we'd get some travel posters, tack them up, and the apartments would come to life."

Besides collecting poster art, the O'Sheas bought the sort of furnishings that give a home character. When Mike was on location in Mexico, he picked up some beautifully carved figurines. On another trip he bought a magnificent wooden Iroquois head that now occupies a prominent position on the mantle. He also purchased a statuette of St. Jude by the great Mexican sculptor, Magyana.

While Mike was finding objets d'art, Virginia was using her spare time to poke around local antique shops. Once she came home with a cranberry-glass kerosene lamp that she converted into a kitchen lighting fixture, and gradually she acquired some marble-topped night stands, a few odd tables, and a quaint old desk.

When they visited friends who were full-time ranchers, the O'Sheas noticed that their homes were equipped with Navajo rugs. Sometimes the rugs were hung as tapestries, or else they were scattered on the floor. In a few places little rugs were used as table mats.

When Virginia asked about the Indian handicraft, she was told that Navajo rugs are not only decorative but are supposed to be lucky as well. The Indian weavers deliberately leave a little hole in each rug so that the evil spirit can escape.

Just about the time when Virginia was won over by Navajo rugs, she and Mike discovered Van Gogh.

The O'Sheas were in Chicago en route to New York when they fell in love with Van Gogh's paintings. The studio representative who met them at the train wanted to take them to the Pump Room at the Ambassador Hotel, but Virginia objected.

"The Pump Room is wonderful," she said tactfully, "but we'd rather skip it and take in the show at the Art Institute."

Admittedly, Virginia Mayo does not look like a girl who prefers the Art Institute to the Pump Room, and the Warner Brothers representative was amazed, but like a good fellow he said nothing and drove the O'Sheas to Michigan Avenue.

In Virginia's own words, "The Van Gogh paintings hit us like dynamite. The canvases were so vivid and exciting that Mike and I were speechless. We walked through the exhibition twice before we could express our feelings. Finally, we decided to buy a couple of reproductions. We settled on a print of a sun-drenched wheat field and a moody blue still-life.

"By the time we got through buying the prints, we were really in danger of missing our train to New York, so we grabbed our pictures and ran out of the Institute. People turned and stared as if we were robbers."

With the Van Gogh reproductions as inspiration Virginia decided that it was just about time to remodel the house Mike had originally bought for his horse.

So they knocked out halls, pushed back walls, made one large, beamed living room. They panelled the dining room, added a fireplace, gave Mike a new set of personally planned closets, and added a kitchen that has every conceivable appliance—a garbage disposal and dishwasher, a ventilator fan over the stove which keeps the room free of cooking odors, a large freezer and refrigerator, and every gadget from Mixmaster to Toastmaster.

For herself, Virginia ordered a large dressing room and bath as an addition to her bedroom. The dressing room is separated from the bedroom by louvred doors which can be closed when she's dressing or when she wants to hide her sewing clutter. Virginia's sewing machine is one of her proudest possessions and stands in a corner of the room near her mirrored and marbled dressing table.

Many of the large architectural changes in the O'Shea house were made while Virginia was abroad working in Captain Horatio Hornblower. She spent her time away from the camera working out decoration plans to put into action later.

A week after she returned to Hollywood, Virginia had her living room walls painted chocolate brown to match the chocolate carpet. She left the beamed ceiling white and ordered an over-scale, three-piece sectional couch so large that she, Mike, and Duke, her Boston terrier, can stretch out full length without being crowded. The couch is in a direct vision line with the television set.

The large, comfortable living room is well-stocked with books and records. And on one wall there is a larger-than-life painting of Virginia. It shows her as Lady Barbara, the character she played in the Hornblower picture, and it was given to her by the studio as a token of gratitude.

If you ask Virginia where she acquired her furniture she will tell you candidly that she bought the new pieces at Barker Brothers, Los Angeles' big furniutre store.

"I'm not a trained decorator," she admits, "and I didn't know how my decorating ideas would work out. The safest way to test them was to buy furniture through a large store and have it sent home. The pieces that didn't fit were returned. Those that did, stayed. You can't engage in that sort of practice with custom-made pieces."

Virginia's own room is furnished very simply. The draperies originally hung in the old dining room. Except for a double bed and some table lamps, the only other pieces in the room are an easy chair and a small desk.

Mike's room is about as Western as you can get without being in a saddle. Virginia decorated it while Mike was on location in Arizona. She filled it with heavy oak furniture, Navajo rugs, and red wall paper. When Mike returned home, his wife had him close his eyes and guided him into the room. He took one long hard look, then grabbed Virginia and kissed her. "The boy from Brooklyn," he said, "always wanted to be a cowboy." Which is why Virginia always smiles when she says, "Mike proposed and won me with a house he bought for a horse!" END

We, therefore, must begin from scratch.

In the first place, no camera has ever done her justice. Through the cold crystal eye of a lens Jane Russell is a sultry wench with hot, brooding eyes, a mass of jet, unruly hair, a kissable mouth and a nose with nostrils that tend to flare at the sight of a male. This is not so. Her complexion is creamy and outdoorish. Her eyes are dark and thoughtful. They snap or smile, they're never, in public, at least, hot and heavy-lidded. Her features are classic, thin and sensitive and her nose crinkles into a grin and never flares at anything.

Even when the camera is focused on that portion of her anatomy which has made her most famous, it exaggerates a quite normal symmetry of design into an RKO trade mark.

When the Las Vegas situation developed into such headlines, MODERN SCREEN decided to break a precedent and talk to Jane to clarify the true personality of this movietown enigma.

We dispensed with the eye because it was well when we spoke to her, and began with the figure.

"Does it bother you," we asked, "hearing all the jokes that are made about your anatomy?"

"No," she said, "it just bores me."

"But don't you realize," we pressed, "that your proportions have become something of a trade mark?"

"Sure," she said, "It's like the label on a can of tomatoes."

That answer should settle once and for all the question of anger on the part of either one of the Waterfields over allusions to Jane's figure. It is a dull part of the routine of being a movie star—but Jane and Bob realize that they're stuck with it.

A great deal has been written about Jane Russell and religion. It has been intimated that she is something close to saintly in private life and as athletic an organizer of gospel gatherings as Billy Graham. It has been said that she formed a group of Hollywood stars and executives into a sectarian force that met weekly, or oftener, in one of the town's largest churches in religious revivals.

That is not true. Jane Russell is neither saintly nor a revivalist. She confesses frankly to a quiet faith and she also confesses, with a glint in her eye, that she gets a bit of plain fun into her life. She has attended and probably still does attend an occasional service with the Hollywood Christian movement that has received so much publicity, but she is not a steady member and most certainly not the founder.

"Those fabulous gatherings of celebrities you read about me getting together," she says with a smile, "are anything but that. And it's odd that someone hasn't found it out before. The group I do meet with began way back when we were all kids. It consists of my brothers, their wives and a few close friends, all of whom were a bit on the hellion side when we were kids. You know, kids who drove cars too fast and smoked too early and things like that. We meet at my house and we sit around on the floor in blue jeans. If you were to peek in the window, you'd think we were having a party. Well, we all decided that now we are grown up, a little religious education wouldn't hurt us, so we get together and have discussions and Bible readings—and it's fun."

ALL you have to do is talk to Jane Russell on any subject for ten minutes and you can see that she isn't capable of going overboard about anything. She has too many interests and, according to her own admission, she's not steady enough on her course to become a fanatic.

"I'm a starter," she said. "I begin things but I never finish them. I started to paint —and never got very far with it. I even started to write," she laughed, "and always wound up whatever I was doing in the middle of a paragraph."

The papers would have you believe that Jane Russell is something of a one-woman orphan asylum, and that she and her husband have every intention of assembling most of the unwanted children of the world in their own small nursery. Last year, some European correspondents even got pretty ugly about it when the word spread that Jane didn't want all the kids that were offered to her for adoption on a trip abroad.

The truth is that right now Jane and Bob have in their home the adopted family they expect to wind up with. It consists of two children.

"Everybody has the idea," Jane said, "that I am the Mother Machree type. Well, I'm not. I am not the sort of woman who can't resist patting a kid on the head in the street. And I certainly don't want every child I see. Bob and I feel deeply for the parentless children of Europe and this country and we like helping them, trying to place them with couples we know who are childless. It's that simple."

The incident of the trial adoption of the baby Jane brought back from London last year, although it will no doubt have a happy ending, is rather humorous. Jane happened to mention casually one day that she would like to adopt another child. It made the papers, and mail began pouring into her hotel offering her babies from all over the land. The phones were busy for days with parents asking Jane to take one of their kids.

A G.I. asked Bob Hope about Jane Russell. "Nice girl," said Robert. "And there's nothing phony about her."

The mother of one child, however, was more enterprising. She showed up at the hotel with an infant and managed to get to see Jane in person. She shoved the tot into Jane's arms and tearfully begged her to take it to America and raise it as her own. Jane was overcome and took the baby with her. When she got to Hollywood, she walked into the house with the kid in a set of new blankets and showed it to her husband.

"How did he take it?" we asked her.

"He hit the ceiling," she said.

However, Bob Waterfield's attitude has changed and he is as fond of the little Irish lad as Jane is. The little boy will be reared as his son.

It is interesting that Jane's desire for a family is not a frantic one, as it so often is with a good many childless women.

"I guess," she said, "that it is because I was part of a large family. And when Bob and I built our house we just automatically put in space for children."

So, contrary to popular opinion, Jane Russell has no intention of maintaining a foundling institution. The press just took for granted that she did.

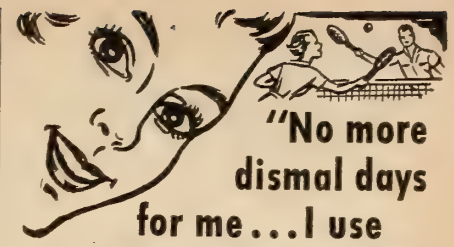
As for her career, Jane Russell is not the movie-struck girl that most motion picture stars are. She looks upon pictures as a business—and when she leaves the sets at the end of a day, she forgets Hollywood. As a matter of fact, Jane sometimes feels she would much rather be something else.

"I don't know exactly what," she said, "but I have a feeling that I would be equally as happy in another line of work. Making movies is hard work for me but there are real compensations such as the money and the nice people I've been thrown in with."

HER private life, too, is unusual for a movie star of her prominence and glamor. Bob Waterfield, her husband, is the boss, no question about it, and Jane refers to him as "my old man," a phrase bristling with respect. When Jane gets through with a picture, Waterfield doesn't live her kind of life—she lives his. When he was in the service, Jane quit pictures and went along with him as many other soldiers' wives did. And when he is on the road during the football season, with the Los Angeles Rams, Jane tags along as a football wife.

Bob Waterfield, although he has a number of good friends in the film industry, prefers the company of football people. Not sports people, just the football clan. He lives football and, according to Jane, finds most other subjects dull.

"As a matter of fact," Jane said, "he is now beginning to worry what he's going to get into when he passes the age that a man should quit throwing passes. He has a keen mind and an analytical one. He doesn't care for coaching, so he'll have to find another outlet for the talent for strategy his years as a quarterback have developed."



Whatever it is that Bob Waterfield does, though, it is quite certain that it will not be a cushy job plucked from the fringes of his wife's career as a movie star. It will be something that will still allow Jane to speak of him respectfully as "my old man."

JANE RUSSELL is very much of a family girl. She is fiercely fond of her mother and brothers and all the in-laws and children. All told are nine grandchildren in the Russell clan. Her brothers are sturdy men making their own way in the world on their own. Two of them have not the slightest interest in movies. The other two, though, would like to be in pictures —and they try for parts whenever the opportunity arises. But unlike a good many young Hollywood hopefuls, they don't sit around growing beards waiting for the phone to ring. They have families —and they are busy at other occupations between movie roles.

"They're pretty sensible about that," Jane says admiringly. "When there's nothing doing in the studios, they get jobs in service stations or driving trucks."

It would be a disservice to Jane Russell to write an analytical study of her without mentioning the one that has made her one of the most popular actresses in Hollywood. It is a quality difficult to describe because it is almost masculine, and that is pretty hard to tag onto a girl as exquisitely feminine as Jane.

The Las Vegas incident—and the contention that if the reporters had asked Jane Russell how she got the shiner she'd have told them—is a good way to begin describing it. She has a basic honesty that will not allow her to lie to escape a result. It is masculine in a sense, because it is based on a fearlessness found usually in brave men who wind up their sentences with, "So make the most of it!" Jane Russell is the kind of person who would say just that. Consequently, there are no petty bickerings on her pictures. She does the best she can in front of cameras —and she has not time for the usual "protection" of scenes and billings, etc, that seem to make up such an important part of the average siren's life in film. And she has no time for people who pretend. Lay it on the line and you can get with Russell. In the main, even the greatest complainers get to like this.

There is in Jane Russell a tremendous humor. She is alive every minute and when not being leered at by a paid villain for a picture, she is a cut-up rather than a femme fatale. Horseplay is fun to Jane and so are somewhat funny jokes when a gang of easygoing laughers get together.

We have, then, in Jane Russell, a mystery woman devoid of mysteries. A movie star, famed for religious crusades who wouldn't think of it, and who, instead, placidly practices a set of religious rules that are based on the simple principle that any kid as strong-willed as she was could use a few thoughts along the spiritual line.

The next time you read a story in the newspapers about Jane Russell that appears a bit far-fetched, don't buy it completely. Just say to yourself, "Now why don't those reporters ask Jane herself about it? She'll tell them the truth—for sure." END

Or Columbia Records releases a new Sinatra disc, "I Hear A Rhapsody," and the voice is the way it always was, but someone thinks it's clever to say, "Why do they waste that gorgeous hit on a guy who doesn't have it anymore?"

This kind of smearing has gotten to be a habit, and a sort of nasty game. People apparently want to see how much the Sinatras can take before they crack. When the newlyweds flew to Europe recently to attend a Command Performance and entertain American troops in Weisbaden, they were accused of battling from here to Germany and home again, and of ruining the performance by being wet blankets. The fact that they spent all their spare time in Germany entertaining soldiers went by the board without any comment. That kind of information just wouldn't fit in with the rest of the picture that's being painted.

The Sinatras can take criticism, as the past few months have shown, but now they're fighting back in their own subtle way. It may be a while before the public sees them as the honest, decent people they really are, but they'll come into their own again because they have to; they're on the right side.

FIVE or six years ago when Frank was earning a million dollars a year and handing out $150 gold cigarette lighters to every Tom, Dick, and Harry, he was considered a wonderful little fellow. When he preached against racial and religious intolerance, he was held up as a progressive, patriotic American. When he made Anchors Aweigh, he was called "the brightest star in the MGM constellation of luminaries."

When, unpublicized, he paid the hospital bills for Mildred Bailey, his office boy, and half a dozen others, even his detractors admitted that he was a generous man. He was invited to the White House, exclusive country clubs and the finest private homes in America; everyone who was anyone sought his friendship, and more than 200 fan clubs saw to it that he never received less than 800 letters a day. Girls swooned when he crooned, night clubs offered him $50,000 for a week's work, and symphony orchestras pleaded with him to sing if only for one night.

How come that within the short span of two years, people are hacking away at his reputation with all the energy they'd use to tear down a skyscraper?

The most popular reason offered is that Sinatra made a mistake by being honest enough to leave his first wife because he had stopped loving her, rather than stay around and make both their lives miserable. He left all right, but he was willing to turn over to Nancy one third of his annual income up to $150,000 and 10% of everything above that. And nobody can keep him away from his children whom he visits two or three times a week.

This is no attempt to white-wash Frank Sinatra. Undoubtedly, he has plenty of faults and has committed many indiscretions. He has from time to time surrounded himself with a band of incredibly seedy characters. He is chronically allergic to sensible advice. He is stubborn and temperamental, but insofar as the American people are concerned, he has given them hundreds of hours of fine entertainment. It is lamentable to think that he is now being dragged down into a mine of ill-feeling, and that his talent, which is still considerable, is a target for ridicule.

Contrary to garbled reports originating on the street, Sinatra's voice is not completely gone. It is still very much in evidence.

Have you seen and heard him in Meet Danny Wilson? His voice was never better. His acting has charm, and quick wit. Yet the local Hollywood yokels were prepared to take in the movie with a laugh—of derision.

Not long ago, Frank was sitting in his office on South Robertson Boulevard in Beverly Hills. He was talking with one of his television writers. Taking inventory of his position, and thinking about the past few months, Frank became justifiably depressed.

His office building was up for sale. His television program couldn't attract a sponsor. He hadn't had a good-selling record in over a year. Universal had shoved back the release date on Meet Danny Wilson, a picture in which he had worked for no salary but a percentage of the profits. His three children were polite to but not particularly enthusiastic about his new wife. He was $40,000 in the hole. There was an even-money chance of CBS cancelling his TV show by June of this year. His fan mail had decreased to a new low. Many of his old friends had deserted him. The 200 Sinatra Fan Clubs had dwindled to four. He felt that the Palm Springs house should be completely done over for Ava—after all, what wife wanted to be reminded of her predecessor? But where was the money coming from?

It all seemed so staggering, that Frank leaned back in his chair and covered his face with his hands.

"Boy," he said, "I'm really in a spot. I've got to get moving."

But for the first time in his life, Frank Sinatra looked beat. No human being can stand up forever as punching bag to the world, and that afternoon Frank knew it. He came perilously close to breaking down. Fortunately for him, he has a resilient nature and has since bounced back.

THAT same afternoon seven miles away, in the Pacific Palisades house she had rented from dance director Bob Alton, Ava Sinatra was feeling none too well herself. She was on lay-off, earning no money (she works only 40 weeks a year) and worrying about when the studio would cast her in another Show Boat. Critics who had seen her in Pandora and Lone Star had criticized her films as adequate vehicles but not the hits Ava once thought they might be. She had just turned down parts in three different pictures.

During her romance with Frank the studio had been none too happy. Fortunately for her, she had many journalist and photographer friends, and they saw her through this trying period. They put her on magazine covers and planted dozens of well-written stories about her activities.

It was Dore Schary who took her out of the doghouse. He cast her in nothing but "A" pictures and ordered the publicity boys to go all-out on a Gardner build-up campaign.

But as Ava began turning down scripts, the studio began to feel that she was being unduly influenced by her new husband, that she wasn't playing ball, and it was decided to let her stew in her own juice.

On this particular afternoon, Ava was stewing. She was also stewing about the housing situation. She had given her small Nichols Canyon home to her sister Bappie. Frank had given his Holmby Hills house to Nancy. The only house left to the newlyweds was the Palm Springs mansion which was in the process of being re-done, and the re-doing was costing a mint.

In addition to all of this, Ava seemed to feel that that everyone in Hollywood was anxious to have her marriage founder on the rocks, to say, "See, I told you it wouldn't last."

That night, Ava and Frank worked out a design for living. They decided to leave town. They would live at Palm Springs away from the gossips and gloom-prophets. They'd stay down on the desert five days a week, drive to Los Angeles on Mondays, return to the desert on Tuesday nights after Frank had finished his TV show.

It worked for a while—not very long—a month or so. Then the stories started anew. Frank has walked out on Ava. Ava had walked out on Frank. Both of them were fighting like a pair of desert rats. Frank was washed-up, so finished that CBS had him down to $3,000 a week, and he was borrowing money from his agent, MCA.

As for Ava, she had had enough. She was moving back with her sister, maybe going home to Smithfield, maybe asking Charley Feldman to get her out of her contract with the studio.

None of this was true. None of it is true. But at long last, instead of doing nothing, Frank and Ava have decided to fight back.

A few weeks ago, for example, a Hollywood press agent called Sinatra down at the desert. "You know how terrible your public relations are," the publicist diplomatically began. "What you need is someone like me to put you right with the fans."

"Don't worry," Frank said good-naturedly. "I'll work it out."

In contrast to former days, Frank wasn't truculent, or aggressive, he was simply confident that he could win his public back, that eventually the public would judge him by his work.

"We figure," Ava told friends, "that our behavior is the best way to fight back at all the rumor-mongers. Let them say anything they want to about Frank and me, but years from now we'll still be together, and people will come to realize that all these stories about us are pure baloney. Not that we don't have our quarrels and arguments. But this marriage is really working."

Ava's new policy calls for her to accompany Frank at every opportunity, to let her actions give lie to the rumors. She doesn't particularly like large formal functions—they make her nervous—but when Universal recently threw a big shindig for Danny Wilson, Ava was there. When Ava, in February, received a magazine award for her performance in Show Boat, she and Frank were the happiest couple at the Hotel Ambassador.

When Frank finishes his TV show on Tuesday nights, he and Ava dine at Romanoff's before returning to the desert.

Ava is even learning how to cook. For her birthday, which comes on Christmas Eve, she whipped up a pot of spaghetti for Frank and their good friends the Axel Stordahls.

As for Sinatra, he knows that his career has temporarily turned sour, that impetuous adolescent moves on his part have antagonized the press and consequently the public. But with Ava beside him, he feels that he will never again make those same mistakes, that after a few years of marriage to Ava the public will again respect him as a decent, hard-working family man. He has offered to go to Korea on a USO tour or any place the Army wants him. He is making every effort to atone for his past errors and to become well-liked.

Many persons have asked if Ava can keep Frank a faithful, loving husband. They smile snidely before you can offer a reply or opinion—so sure are they that they can already see the crooked handwriting on the wall.

They forget that Frank is imbued with an indomitable will, that he originally pushed himself to the top by his own efforts, that whatever else he may have been, quitter was never one of them.

Right now, he is trying desperately to get the lead opposite Betty Grable in The Farmer Takes A Wife. He also has another film lined up at Universal, and the nightclubs of Las Vegas still offer him $10,000 for a week's work. Maybe he isn't the great attraction he once was, maybe he has two strikes against him, but so long as he has Ava, he's a long way from being out.

Ava and Frank Sinatra are fighting to make their marriage a success, and as the Good Book sayeth, "He that is without sin, let him first cast a stone . . ." END how casual can he get?

Well, the old Hollywood grapevine began to hum and it soon came to Bing's ears that Bob was hurt. This upset him. Bing is inordinately fond of Bob. How to apologize? How to make amends? He waited until he ran into Bob casually one day and then he said, "About that dinner. Well, I was afraid I might say the wrong thing." And then, grinning at Bob, he added, "Besides, I wasn't hungry that night."

That did it. Bob understood this was an apology and took it as such. And they are the best of friends again.

The autograph seekers get sore at Bing every now and again. At a recent football game, for instance, they started crowding around and yelling, and Bing told them to go to their seats, he wasn't signing a single book. This, he feels, is a display, and he's worried lest someone will think he enjoys that kind of "I-can't-let-my-public-down" attitude. Besides, he had come to see a football game. And, he figured, so had everybody else. But on his way out, long after the disgruntled kids had gone to their seats grumbling, a little girl waiting by his car asked for his autograph. This was up Bing's alley—one child who did not obstruct the view.

THERE is absolutely no ham in his character. When he was asked, "How does it feel to know that more people have heard your voice than that of any other man?" he answered. "Thrilling, if true. But it's just Decca publicity." And in evaluating his acting ability (he won an Academy Award, not for singing, but for acting in Going My Way) he said, "I believe I'm a fair actor when I'm playing a character who is like Bing Crosby. Any other assignment I can't handle at all, so I'm no actor." At all times he's Bing Crosby, and as Bing Crosby he doesn't impress himself. He doesn't even keep a scrapbook (he never has). Naturally, his office—where his two brothers and his father run his many enterprises—keep clippings, but Bing just "doesn't go for that name-in-the-paper" routine.

Yet, once when he was in Canada he received a call from a little town in Vermont called St. Albans. On his way back to New York when his train passed through St. Albans, and would Bing accept a jug of Vermont Maple Syrup? He would indeed. A newspaper reporter arranged for the stopover and, en masse, the citizens arrived at the station. The mayor made a speech as the syrup was presented. Schools were let out so the kids could see Bing. "I'm very big in St. Albans," he says, proudly.

But he'll turn down a formal banquet attended by the most important dignitaries in the United States.

He'll give a national magazine writer the run around (if there's something more pleasant to do like playing golf) but he'll pose in a chef's hat with a cup of coffee and doughnut and let the caption read, "The face most conducive to dunking," to help out an old friend who's just opened a restaurant.

For years the Hollywood Women's Press Club has voted him the most uncooperative actor in Hollywood. They finally picked on somebody else because Bing just didn't seem to care. Wouldn't send the press girls insulting wires, or mend his ways by becoming available for interviews and photographs.

You can imagine that consternation reigned when at last year's HWPC's Christmas party the new Santa Claus turned out to be Bing Crosby! The girls demanded to know how it had happened. What whimsical gesture was this?

It was discovered that one of the members had happened to bump into Bing on the street and told him she thought it would be a funny gag. "Sure," Bing said. "I'll do it."

Later when he was asked why he had come to the party where he was such anathema, he said, "I would have come a long time before but nobody ever asked me."

Bing is not lazy, he is simply relaxed. As he says, "There's nothing to be accomplished by running around in circles."

He is orderly and methodical. He arises at seven in the morning, eats a big breakfast, writes letters—business as well as personal—in long hand. Then he makes his telephone calls. He is always prompt and expects other people to be.

When Bill Morrow first came to work as Bing's writer on his radio show, Bill was prone to breeze into the gag meeting from 15 minutes to a half hour late. He soon learned that this was not going down well with Bing. So early in their relationship Bill learned to be strictly on time. But Bing still remembers and will say, "We'll set up the meeting for nine-thirty so Bill will be here by ten."

DESPITE the fact that the Crosby enterprises are vast—everything from a pocket-sized breath freshener to a baseball team—Bing does not consider himself a good business man. He allocates authority to those who know how to accept it. When he was asked why, with all his money, he kept on working, he said, "First I owe quite a bit of money and besides, there are a good many people who, in one way or another, are dependent on my working."

You may be amazed to hear that Bing owes money and that he admits it. Well, to begin with, he is not, as people think, the world's richest man. And, as with all widespread business organizations like his, bad investments have been made. "Lots of my money goes to taxes," he says, "the rest is reinvested in outside interests. I've had to borrow money to keep a lot of these going. If they pay off I'll be in clover. Until they do I've got to keep working. If I quit now I'd be in the red." But Bing does not hoard as he has been accused of doing—either his old records or his dough.

So far, Bing has been adamant about television for himself, although Crosby Enterprises have put together a series of television shows. The reason that he will not undertake a show of his own at the moment reveals another interesting facet of his nature. Despite his easy going appearance, his casualness, Bing is a perfectionist. He does not want to step into a medium that is still disorganized, still finding its way. Because he is a perfectionist, any show that he would do would be far too expensive since, "I don't think I'm big enough just to get up there and ad lib," he says. The problems of TV are still too complicated. So even though he may seem relaxed to the point of indifference his actual behavior belies this. His as yet unreleased movie, Paramount's Just For You was made in record time, as are all his films. His radio show is performed with the least "running around in circles."

It was not laziness on Bing's part but his love of perfection that made him the first person to put a big radio show on tape and have it rebroadcast on the designated night. The network objected. They had never used taped stuff before. Wouldn't the public complain when they learned their talent was not performing at that exact moment? Bing thought not. And Bing can be a quietly stubborn guy when he knows he's right. For the advantages of tape are many, even to the listening audience, the main one being that any part of the show that falls down can be re-recorded. All the performers were with Bing for, to them, it meant doing shows ahead of time so they could have an occasional vacation.

It was known in radio circles as "the battle of the tape." But by being a quiet fighter—no scenes, no screams—Bing won.

In his pictures he will never do what he believes is wrong and according to every man who has ever directed him, "Bing has an unerring instinct for knowing what is right for him."

"Keep it simple," is his motto.

A simple, well-ordered life gives him more time to spend on his 25,000-acre, well-organized Nevada cattle ranch, more time to travel. And there's always golf. So why should he complicate his life with TV or anything else unless he has to?

He wants his four boys to know the value of a buck but he also wants them to know the rewards of generosity. In his own words this is what he wants out of life: "I'd like to be justifiably proud of our sons."

Light-hearted as he is, there is one thing that really upsets him. He does blow his top if the boys' grades in school are not too good or if he hears that they have been boastful. There are two types that Bing cannot abide—a braggart and a gossip. All he asks of the boys is that they become well-rounded human beings, that they educate themselves to be what they want to be, that they learn to shift for themselves. As he says, "Just so they're not spoiled. Not pig-headed nor bigheaded, just level-headed." And when any one of them falls short of this ideal Bing gets really mad.

Bing is a religious man. He believes in going to church (he is a Catholic) and does so himself as does his family, but if you are not a churchgoer that's your business. Tolerance is the keynote of his philosophy of living. And he puts his philosophy into practice. His philanthropies are many—and these are non-sectarian—but he doesn't like them talked about. Although his most rewarding experience was, in his own words, "singing to our men overseas."

For all his methodical ways, for all his vagaries, the charm of the man comes through when you really know Bing Crosby. Ask a group of newspaper people who went on a recent junket to Elko, Nevada, with him. It was for the opening of his film, Here Comes The Groom, and most of the press arrived with their typewriters ready to mow the man down. Bing began by winning the staid Boston contingent—first-naming both the men and women—and ended by harmonizing with the whole group.

But the interesting thing is that Bing doesn't deliberately set out to charm the press just because it amuses him to do so. He did not appear as Santa Claus at the Hollywood Women's Press Club because it delighted him to be quixotic. It was only that this is what he felt like doing.

In many ways Bing is the least complicated and best controlled actor around. Having no ham in him he does not wear his emotions like diamond studs. He never over-dramatizes himself and, although he lived through, at one time, a severe personal tragedy there was never any breast beating. During a time when he had a grave decision to make he wore the same manner that has characterized him for years. Nobody but those closest to him, whom he consulted, knew he was less than merry.

He never makes a snap decision, which is one of the reasons why he is a good craftsman, a good husband and a good father. In order to get along with Bing you have to accept him as he is. You have to accept the fact that there are private places in his heart.

Once, someone put this question to Bing: "If someone asked you 'What is Bing Crosby really like,' what would you say?"

He sucked on his pipe a minute, and then he said, "I've always seemed a pretty dull fellow to myself."

That's Bing Crosby's estimate of himself. And, the funny thing is, he means it. The funnier thing is, he's the only fellow who, after having met Bing Crosby, would give that opinion. END

I SAW IT HAPPEN

The Capitol Theater in Cincinnati was filled to capacity when Victor Mature made a personal appearance there. Victor mentioned that since Cincinnati was close to his home town of Louisville, Kentucky, he had a lot of relatives there. Naturally, the audience applauded wildly—all except one fellow who snickered. Vic looked up into the balcony where the sound came from and said, "There's my cousin, now—his name is Immature!"

THE INSIDE STORY

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Why is nothing ever mentioned about Gene Tierney's oldest daughter, Daria, who should be eight by now?
—B. B., DORCHESTER, MASS.

A. Daria is in a boarding school in Pennsylvania.

Q. Is it true that Elizabeth Taylor paid for her own engagement ring?
—V. C., KANSAS CITY, MO.

A. She advanced the money for it.

Q. How many times has Dick Powell been married and how many children does he have?—Y. D., DENVER, COLO.

A. Powell has been married three times, has four children, two of whom are his by adoption.

Q. How much does Mario Lanza weigh now? —T. R., NEWARK, N. J.

A. 167 pounds.

Q. I hear that Elizabeth Taylor and Alan Ladd are both Christian Scientists and that when Ladd was in the Army he refused to okay an operation for the removal of his appendix. Is this truth or rumor?
—A. S., NEW YORK, N. Y.

A. Truth.

Q. Is it true that Gene Kelly and Fred Astaire are really quite bald?
—D. O., CHICAGO, ILL.

A. Yes.

Q. Does John Wayne have a nasty temper? Is that why he's so difficult to direct? —H. H., RALEIGH, N. C.

A. Wayne has a quick temper but takes direction easily.

Q. Does Doris Day bleach her hair?
—B. C., CHARLESTON, S. C.

A. Yes.

Q. Does Jimmy Stewart have a clause in his contract which forbids the mentioning of his great war record? If so, why? —U F., MEADE, PA.

A. Stewart refuses to trade on his outstanding Air Forces record, wants to be judged publicly only on his record as an actor.

Q. I understand that June Allyson gets a spending allowance of only $10 a week. How does she manage to live on that?
—B. H., PATERSON, N. J.

A. She seldom pays cash for anything, has all her bills paid by her business manager. Most of the $10 goes for tips.

Q. Is it true or just publicity that Betty Hutton reads the Bible before she goes to bed each night?—V. F., MOBILE, ALA.

A. Before she retires, Betty drinks a glass of milk, reads her Bible.

Q. How old is Bette Davis? How old is her husband, Gary Merrill? Isn't Betty the boss in this marriage because of her superior earning power?
—E. V., PORTLAND, ME.

A. Bette is 44. Merrill is 37. He wears the pants.

Q. How come I hardly see photos any more of Mr. and Mrs. Fred MacMurray and their children?
T. R., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

A. Mrs. MacMurray has been chronically ill for the past ten years. Because of that, the family does little socializing, absolutely no night-clubbing.

Q. What caused the split between Nancy Olson and Paramount?
—T. L., PEORIA, ILL.

A. Nancy wants better parts.

Q. What happened to Marilyn Monroe's first husband?
—R. I., DEL MAR, CALIF.

A. He committed suicide.

Q. I understand it cost Bob Taylor a fortune to divorce Barbara Stanwyck. How much did she settle for?
—N. U., LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

A. Their home valued at $100,000 and 15% of his gross income, annually.

BETTY HUTTON AND CHARLIE O'CURRAN ELOPE . . . CARLETON CARPENTER "MIXES

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

When Betty Hutton and Charles O'Curran flew home from their Las Vegas elopement, Betty's little girls, Lindsay and Candy, met them at the door.

"Are you going to live here with us?" five-year-old Lindsay asked her brand new step-father. Charlie said he was.

"You can set up a bed in our room," the little girl offered. "We know Mother likes to be alone." (!)

Betty certainly looked the part of the blooming bride at the champagne-and-cake reception at her home the afternoon following the elopement which surprised the natives and kept me up all night working on my scoop.

Her dress was white satin and she wore orchids in her hair and carried an orchid corsage.

"How does it happen that you come up with a white satin gown if you and Charlie got married on the spur of the moment?" I asked her.

"Oh, I bought this two years ago," she laughed, "—just in case!"

I have a hunch this marriage of Betty's

Dale Robertson and his pretty Jackie do the town on one of their rare nights out. The Robertsons expect an heir—or heiress—early in June.

Jane Powell came to the Academy Award dinner with husband Geary Steffen, later sang one of the songs nominated for an Oscar.

Slowpokes Ronald Reagan and Nancy Davis, who finally made it to the altar, still had that "honeymoon look" at the Oscar dinner.

Lauren Bacall almost leaped out of her seat when her Bogie was called up for an Oscar. Lauren kisses him as Greer waits her turn.

Newshounds took a second look when Carleton Carpenter squired Joan Evans to the Oscar fete. He says he's "serious" about Barbara Ruick.

Jane Wyman beamingly introduced young Travis Kleef eld, to all her friends at the Academy Award party, later called off their engagement.

CHEMICALLY" WITH BARBARA RUICK . . . MARILYN MONROE GIVES A STRAIGHT ANSWER TO A CURVED QUESTION!

may work out. First, Charlie adores her and la Hutton is a gal who loves admiration and attention. Second, he is rapidly coming up as a very talented and high priced choreographer in the business. He gets a big salary which means that money will not be a problem between them as it was in her marriage to Ted Briskin.

Third—but far from least, O'Curran has an easy going, likeable disposition and when Betty gets upset about anything he just kids her out of it.

So I says—Good luck and much happiness, Mr. and Mrs. O'Curran.

CARLETON CARPENTER admits he is more serious about Barbara Ruick than he has been about any other gal in his life.

"She's a wonderful girl," says the long, lanky boy they call Stretch. "Great talent. Great sense of humor. Chemically we mix well."

But as for marriage:

"Who knows?" he says. "I can't see myself getting married. Wouldn't it be hysterical if we just up and did it, though!"

For one thing, Barbara understands Carleton's haphazard way of dating—a purely spontaneous thing. He says he never knows where he will be or what he'll be doing three hours later and can't make plans in advance. He likes to call a girl, ask her to go out, then go pick her up—just like that. He believes honesty is the best policy for a girl and boy—saves misunderstandings later on.

LOOKING Back Over "Oscar" Night: When Humphrey Bogart won, Lauren Bacall leaped from her seat as though she had been shot with electricity, also tripping Bogey before he got started down the aisle.

My girl, Jane Wyman, was a vision in pale lavender and so cute when she sang the prize winning "In The Cool, Cool, Cool Of The Evening" with Danny Kaye. (Bing Crosby was in San Francisco.)

Of the girls who appeared on the stage—Janice Rule's lovely white chiffon gown with its "smoke" colored bodice and overskirt was voted tops.

Too many of the girls tried to pull a Marlene Dietrich and wore black gowns when they made the presentations. Zsa Zsa Gabor's skirt was slit even higher than Dietrich's—but it didn't rate the wolf whistles "grandma" got with hers.

Leslie Caron loped onto the stage. The little French girl is a fine dancer—but she ain't much of a walker!

Eleanor Parker was the most beautiful "loser"—and by far the most gracious in applauding the decision to Vivien Leigh.

Shelley Winters just nudged Vittorio Gassman. And how come she wasn't wearing a smitch of makeup—not even lipstick?

Carleton Carpenter surprised the sidewalk jitterbugs by showing up with Joan Evans instead of Barbara Ruick.

Arlene Dahl's floating pink Fontanna gown was the loveliest of the evening.

Debbie Reynolds sat where I could watch her and everytime a winner was announced she'd yell, "Oh, Gee!"

Montgomery Clift, all dressed up in black tie, was with the Kevin McCarthys—but Monty didn't look disappointed. He hadn't expected to win. (Continued on next page)

Betty Hutton sang for the Marines only a few miles behind the front in Korea on a recent USO tour. (For more about Betty see pg. 22.)

When Bette Davis first walked onto the stage hardly anyone recognized her with her poodle haircut. Even emcee Danny Kaye said with some surprise, "Well, it's BETTE DAVIS!"

Almost overlooked in the excitement of this year's winners was Broderick Crawford who won two years ago for All The King's Men. But Brod had his own private reasons for being happy: he sat and held hands all evening with his pretty Kay. They actually beam since the reconciliation.

Just a note to the Academy Awards itself: If the actual winners are out of town and cannot attend in person, arrangements should be made to pipe them in via radio as was done last year. There's something awfully cold about an Oscar being given to a stand-in—no matter how glamorous.

"URGENT that you see Miss Jane Wyman at once in the Polo Lounge," the maitre d' whispered in my ear, at the Cinema Editors' Dinner.

"They wouldn't put me through to you on the telephone. And I wanted you to be the very first to know that Travis and I are engaged," Jane said.

Her eyes were twinkling like twin stars as she went on to tell me how happy she was.

But just when everyone thought that Jane and Travis were going to elope, Jane telephoned and told me her engagement was broken.

"Has it anything to do with the difference in your ages?" I asked. (He's just 26 and Jane is much older.) "Nothing in the world," she said. "We are the only two people, I guess, who weren't conscious of the difference in our ages. The dawn came after we sat down and talked over our future and we both knew it just wasn't right."

Travis, who inherited a fortune from his father, is actively engaged in a housing project in San Diego. As soon as he and Jane broke their engagement, he left for San Diego. Jane turned off her telephone and talked to only her closest friends.

I really think she is very upset, but as she said, "It's better to break it now than to have a broken marriage later."

Recently, Jane had dinner with Ronald Reagan (her ex-husband) and his bride, Nancy. Because of their children, Jane and Ronnie

It was all around them! A dead man's curiously twisted smile, a still-heard echo in a hidden catacomb, a glowing bed of fiery jewels! Here treasure-hunt flared into man-hunt—turning a torrid corner of the tropics into flame!

WARNER BROS! THRILL-SWEPT TROPICAL ADVENTURE!

SCREEN PLAY BY N. RICHARD NASH Music by Max Steiner • DIRECTED BY GORDON DOUGLAS • PRODUCED BY DAVID WEISBART

What's what with Scott Brady and Susan Ball? No comment from them, but they've been seen around town a lot lately, here with George Fisher.

Arlene Dahl's dreamy pink gown walked off with "prettiest" award on Oscar night. Lex Barker agreed but kept getting tangled up in it.

Bette Davis with her new poodle cut, and Gary Merrill resplendent in a plaid dinner jacket, were a snappy twosome at Zapata premiere.

will always be friends.

MANY people will say that Marilyn Monroe did wrong in posing in the nude for an art calendar several years ago when she was broke. But she did right in admitting that the picture is hers.

"I was broke," Marilyn explains, "and when Tom Kelly, the artist-photographer, told me that he had an order for a nude art study and that his wife, Natalie, would be present throughout the sitting—well, I just couldn't turn down the money.

"When the calendar was circulated, my studio almost had a fit. Some of my friends advised me to deny to my last breath that I had posed for the picture. They even said I should say I had posed only for the head and that it had been pasted on a nude body.

"But, heck" sighed Marilyn, philosophically, "it looks like my body, too. I just decided to be honest about the whole thing and pretty soon people will forget about it, I think."

Marilyn may not be the brainiest blonde in town—but she's honest and she's sincerely trying to make a successful career for herself. Since she clicked, she hasn't played the nightclub circuits with a different beau every night, either.

Her only serious date recently has been Joe DiMaggio, who seems to have a real crush on her. Whether or not Marilyn returns the interest, I don't know.

I do know—she is the perfect doll for 20th Century-Fox to star in the life story of Jean Harlow when the platinum blonde's career is made into a movie.

Nobody recognizes Tony Dexter in public. Saw him dancing with his wife at the Cocoanut Grove the other night and when he tripped slightly a bobbysoxer at the next table said, "Who's that man who looks like an actor who almost fell down! ! !"

This goes to prove what I've said all along—Tony's makeup as Valentino changed his natural appearance more than anyone thought.

He'll need a couple of good roles using his own face before he begins to be greatly pestered by the autograph hounds.

P.S. Believe it or not—Tony is still No. 1 man in my MODERN SCREEN fan mail!

PAGING Jane Powell in A Hurry: Janie, I'm getting a lot of criticism about your silvery hair. Your fans don't like it because they say it makes you look "gray headed," and you're too cute and too young for that. If you just intended it to be a silvery-blonde tint—something musta happened in the dye job.

Such is the life of a columnist. Gene Tierney stopped by my table with Kirk Douglas and all the time we were talking she called him "Kirkie." I printed that.

Then she went to New York and told a reporter that she never called him "Kirkie" in her life and wondered how it started?

Our "usual" weather (this year, anyway) with the rain coming down in buckets and most of the canyon roads roaring like rivers, didn't keep the guests from attending the Donald Nelson party in their home atop Coldwater Canyon.

Only Joan Fontaine and Collier Young sent regrets. Joan, who also lives in a hillside house, said she was afraid she couldn't get back to her children.

My escort was Leo Genn, handsome and talented British actor, who was the guest of honor. If you saw Quo Vadis you know just how fine an actor he is.

Leo called for me carrying a red umbrella belonging, he said, to his landlady. We drove through water up to the hubcaps of the car—and when you're swirling around mountain roads—that's no fun, pals. I must say Leo was most amusing and comforting about the whole thing.

Once there—we forgot about our perilous journey in the gayety of the warm, flower-bedecked house and the many guests already there.

I had a long talk with Gregory Peck who is taking Greta and the three boys to Europe to stay at least a year and not to avoid the income tax.

"We'll stay a year IF I can get a job," said Greg, deadpan.

"I'm not worried about THAT," I laughed. P.S. He has a job in Roman Holiday with Willy Wyler which will be filmed in Rome.

The Pecks plan to take a house in the south of France and then go to Finland for the Olympic games. Greta looks awfully cute—she's so much thinner, about size 9.

JEAN PIERRE AUMONT still looks so very sad but he tells me he finds comfort in talking about Maria Montez with all the people who knew her.

"I used to try to avoid talking about her," he said. "But now it is relief to my heart."

Seems I run into the Walter Pidgeons at every dinner party I attend. They are about the most popular dinner guests I know. That's because Walter is always so gay and makes a point of being pleasant to everyone.

After dinner was over—by at least three hours—up the canyon in the still pouring rain came Hedy Lamarr—and surprise, surprise—there wasn't a single complaint out of Hedy, even about the weather. Luscious Lamarr is usually having more troubles than the old lady in the shoe—with her children, or her career, or a husband, or life in general.

Yes, we all had a very gay time at the Nelsons'. During the regime of FDR, Donald was a top official in Washington and he and Valerie, his pretty English wife, are very popular in our town.

WHEN Hedy Lamarr finally went into court to divorce Ted Stauffer, hotel operator, she charged him with beating her. This, indeed, came as a surprise, for when they separated Hedy said it was "just one of those things"—no bitterness on either side. She told me his business activities kept him in Mexico and her interests were in Hollywood.

As surprising as her charges were—Ted was as eager to have the marriage ended as Hedy—so he put up no defense.

Now Hedy, the Beautiful, is free to take on Husband No. 5 if she is so minded.

Might be director Stanley Rubin, who has also courted Gloria Graham and Coleen Grey. But, by the time this is in print, somebody else will probably be Head Man in Hedy's heart.

The Letter Box: "Leona," of Detroit, who is 15, writes: "I can understand Elizabeth Taylor falling in love with and marrying an older man like Michael Wilding. I'M in love with Michael Rennie!"

Helen Baker writes: "Hasn't Frank Sinatra had about enough bad luck? Let's start printing some nice things about Frankie." I agree—enough's enough and Frankie has certainly had it.

Vivian Westmorland, Cincinnati, doesn't believe that Dale Robertson drinks only milk. It isn't the only thing Dale drinks, Vivian, but it's his staple—five quarts a day!

Well, guess that just about winds us up. That's all for now. See you next month!

hollywood report

famous columnist for The Hollywood Reporter

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Make a bet that Betty Hutton's new marriage will be every bit as tempestuous as her previous one—and for no other reason except that Betty LOVES excitement. At the press conference following her wedding to Charlie O'Curran she told me, "I met Charlie seven months ago, when he was directing my dances in Somebody Loves Me. We fought like cats and dogs. And the more I fought with him the more I loved him!" . . . The Dale Robertsons expect their baby in June. If it's a boy, Dale won't let Jackie name him Junior. Says he: "It's too presumptuous." . . . Mona Freeman will unveil her new glamor personality any picture now. She left Paramount, after a nine-year contract there, because she was tired of playing little girl roles.

Freeman

Aly Khan's household help at Chateau de l'Horizon has been notified to expect a visit from Princess Rita sometime this summer. But his lawyer went back to France with this word from La Hayworth: "Let me think about it. I want to make up my own mind about a divorce or reconciliation" . . . Meanwhile, Rita's whirl with Kirk Douglas, after his brief romance with Gene Tierney, rocked Hollywood. Odds aren't too good, however, on the Rita-Kirk kindling continuing, since his children are coming out to spend the summer with him . . . And here's another hot one: Oleg Cassini wants to make it a third try with Miss Tierney. His argument: "A successful Hollywood marriage, where the wife is a movie star, includes a husband who is willing to humble himself and wait on her hand and foot." Oleg's willing! . . . Her parents objected strongly to Joan Evans' romance with handsome, young, used-car dealer Kirby Weatherly, who used to be an actor, to no avail. This one's a real sizzler . . . Will Deanna Durbin ever make a picture again? She writes from France: "Never happier, just singing lullabies to my baby."

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Talking with John Agar at a party in Beverly Hills, I found him a trifle on the unhappy side about several writers who have been sniping at him because of his brush with the Los Angeles Traffic Department almost a year ago and a brief stay (less than two months) at the Sheriff's Honor Farm. This criticism has cost him several good movie jobs, since they implied he was unreliable. But John hasn't touched anything stronger than a coke since then! Also, he has been almost painfully punctual for interviews and whatever else has been asked of him—and, in his desire to be completely cooperative, has gone in for publicity promotions from which he once studiously shied.

Agar

Some writers have implied that John was angered with his former wife, Shirley Temple, for taking their baby across the country to Washington, D.C. John refutes it with, "Where else should a little girl be but with her mother?" One "reporter" wrote that John's wife, the former Loretta Barnett, was older than he and a one-time starlet, and that his actions had brought disgrace on Hollywood—none of which is true. And John, who has been remarkably patient about this shoddy treatment in the press, (Continued on page 14) afraid I'll turn out to be like his own sister! Maybe the things they say about her are true. But if you don't love your husband... and you're crazy about somebody else... haven't you got a right to do something about it? Like Mae did! My guy's afraid that maybe I'd act the same. And you know something? Maybe I would... maybe I would..."

These daughters certainly bring new ideas into the house—break the ice of old habits, so to speak. For instance it's ten-to-one that your daughter discovered Tampax before you did—Tampax, that improved method of sanitary protection (worn internally).

Perfected by a doctor, Tampax needs no belts, pins or bulky outside pads. It really represents a highly modern idea in monthly protection—helps take the pressure off your mind at "those times." With Tampax there's no worry about odor or those revealing edges or ridges that you see showing through other women's skirts or dresses. Your social poise is sure to improve when you wear Tampax.

Daintiness is the key word for Tampax—from the slender white applicator (you needn't touch the Tampax!) all the way through to the final disposal. Pure surgical cotton provides unusual absorbency. ... Sold in 3 sizes: Regular, Super, Junior. Full month's supply may be carried in purse....Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

said that several times he was on the verge of chucking the acting game and going into the job he always wanted before he came to Hollywood—a golf professional . . . Maybe it's time the tearer-downers let John alone. He has proved he's a regular guy, has learned his lesson, and should be given a fair opportunity to regain his former status in movies.

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

U-I stopped Peggy Dow's pay checks—because her honeymoon just wouldn't stop! . . . Andre De Toth packed the three kids to Veronica Lake in New York, prior to their divorce, and moved in with his mother . . . Errol Flynn refused to let Pat Wymore puncture her earlobes for earrings. He just doesn't like punctured earlobes!

The big squabble between Joan Fontaine and Bill Dozier, aside from the $8,000 she claims her ex-husband owes her for furniture he moved from their house and tax money that she loaned him, centers on daughter Deborah. Bill refused to let his daughter accompany her mother to Europe for some picture-making there . . . I hear their respective bosses aren't too happy about those home movies Tony Curtis and Jerry Lewis have been making . . . Icicles—but Icicles!—when Jane Wyman attended a party with Travis Kleefeld and either snubbed or just plain didn't see—I dunno which—Diane Garrett, who used to go to parties with Kleefeld . . . The only trouble I've been able to discern in the Ruth Roman-Morty Hall household is that he likes to live in New York and she likes Hollywood . . . One fan yelled "Shell Gas!" when Shelley Winters and Vittorio Gassman showed up at the Viva Zapata! preem. But isn't that Vittorio the quiet one. Shel kept prodding him and muttering, "Say something to me—people are watching!" . . .

His friends say that Franchot Tone's devotion to his sons is greater, much greater, than any love he's ever had for Barbara Payton—so much so that ex-wife Jean Wallace made a firm stand for full custody. "He spoils the boys terribly," Jean said, "by giving them $10 or $20 every time he sees them."

QUICK QUOTES:

Loretta Young: "When I went to school the only thing I understood about figures was that they're good to hang clothes on" . . . Betty Grable, when I asked her how she prepared for her role in The Farmer Takes A Wife: "I attended the County Fair last summer" . . . Jane Russell, after she "ran into" that black eye in Las Vegas: "Everyone is happy as a lark at my hearthside" . . . Jan Sterling's line of snazzy dialog, directed towards Tony Curtis in Flesh And Fury: "Mother told me never to sell myself cheap, 'cause I'll never hit the jackpot that way!" . . . Joan Crawford: "I have been reported dating Scott Brady and feuding with Gloria Grahame while we were shooting Sudden Fear. But when you're making an independent picture you haven't time for sex or feuds—and I resent it because both make for a happy life!" . . . Ava Gardner: "I should have married sooner. I'd be a mother by now".

ODDS BODKINS:

The only two charge accounts Marilyn Monroe has in town are at bookstores. What does she do—decorate her apartment with dust jackets? . . . Jean Peters has a new vocation: designing costumes for Hollywood's new little theatre group, The Gallery Players . . . All of a sudden there isn't a more conscientious actor at 20th than Dan Dailey, and what's brought on the change I wouldn't be for knowing . . . Checking through my files I found that Mickey Rooney directed Aldo Ray's first picture, My True Story, two years ago at Columbia. Ray, the town's new rave leading man, played a bit as a chauffeur in that one . . . Tin plate on the door of Walter Wanger's bungalow at Monogram Studio: "No Peddlers Or AGENTS" . . .

Penny Edwards left Republic and got a new contract at 20th because she was fed up with riding and never getting any love scenes in Rep's Westerns. So what happens? Her first picture at 20th is Ty Power's Pony Soldier, in which she rides, rides, RIDES and has never a love scene! . . . Did you too notice that Katie Hepburn's hair seemed to get redder and redder as The African Queen unreeled? . . . Bing Crosby started an ice cream company. Now you can see him (movies), hear him (radio), spin him (records), breathe him (cold cure) and smear him on your kid brother's kisser . . . Jonas Schrift, Shel's pop, saw his daughter in A Place In The Sun at the Academy Award Theatre. When the canoe tipped over and Shel drowned he left the theatre because as far as he was concerned the picture was over! . . . Mary Livingstone fainted in Palm Springs recently. picture of the month

Robin Hood (Richard Todd), loyal to his absent King Richard, fights the tyrannies of Prince John's opportunists by rallying around him a band of fighting men in Sherwood Forest.

Maid Marian (Joan Rice) visits her childhood sweetheart, Robin, in his lair. She tells him that King Richard has been imprisoned in Germany during the Crusades and must be ransomed.

Robin, flanked by Friar Tuck and his men, challenges the entrance of the Black Knight into the Forest. The patriotic outlaw does not recognize the Knight as the King he has fought so hard to ransom. After the King reveals his identity, he revokes Robin's sentence as an outlaw, names him Earl of Locksley and, in addition to a knighthood, gives him Maid Marian's hand in marriage.

ROBIN HOOD

■ Walt Disney's all-live-action retelling of the Robin Hood legend was made in England with a strictly British cast, yet much of it is reminiscent of a horse opera, with the zing of arrows replacing the roar of guns. Far from detracting from the tale, this makes it all the more fun. Richard Todd, in the title role and in the spirit of things, plays his part mostly with a twinkle in his eye and a mischievous grin. But the story makes the roguish, romantic side of Robin's nature subsidiary to the patriotic: It tells how his faithful band helps hold the plundering proclivities of King Richard's regent, Prince John, in check until the monarch returns from the Crusades. The intrigues, the chases and the daring escapes are shown against a background of medieval customs and the English countryside, caught in full flavor by Technicolor cameras. Most of Robin's familiar friends and foes are here: an eccentric but vastly amusing Friar Tuck; a properly robust Little John, and a regal Dowager Queen. Pretty Joan Rice is pert and believable as Maid Marian, except when she dons boys' clothes, when she still looks pretty and pert. All in all, this Sherwood Forest makes a more than satisfactory substitute for the worn Western prairie.

DEADLINE—U.S.A.

It's improbable that Humphrey Bogart will win another "Oscar" for his performance in Deadline—U.S.A., but it is a satisfactory piece of work nevertheless, and he deserves a rising vote of thanks from the American Society of Newspaper Editors for the finesse with which he plays a crusading editor. Bogart fights a triple battle: (1) with his late publisher's heirs, who want to sell their newspaper property for amalgamation with another metropolitan daily; (2) with the city's crime overlord, and (3) with his former wife. He loses one of the battles but wins the other two. If this sounds pat and according to pattern, it is both those things, and Bogart's part is one that has been played, with variations, by many actors. But the plot and the playing have this in common: They are so intelligently handled that what is mostly just melodramatic excitement sometimes takes on a kind of dramatic punch. Thus when Bogart talks about the importance of a free and non-monopolistic press, he delivers his speech so sincerely—and the words he speaks are written so well—that the effect, for the moment at least, is quite telling. Telling, too, is Kim Hunter's characterization of a woman grass-widowed by the press of press-time, and there are portraits of a harassed, hard-working city editor and a group of reporters that are as real as printer's ink. All this may explain why the picture seems, in retrospect, slightly disappointing. It is so much better in parts than most melodramas, and so much more successful in capturing the flavor of newsprint than run-of-the-mill films, that one wishes it were more: a really good motion picture about the serious side of newspaperdom. That is something that the movies have seldom produced. Maybe Hollywood's rising young writer-director, Richard Brooks, who deserves credit for this one, is the man who can do it.

Cast: Humphrey Bogart, Kim Hunter, Ed Begley, Audrey Christie, Ethel Barrymore.—20th Century-Fox.

THE MARRYING KIND

American movies are often criticized for failing to do one thing that foreign films manage so well—picturing the average lives of average people in a realistic manner. Here, however, is a film from Hollywood that does just that and in a consistently entertaining fashion. This is no West Coast dream world, peopled with overly sophisticated players living in palaces and dressed in tomorrow's styles, but you or I, or that guy over there, and his wife. "That guy" is Aldo Ray, and his wife is Judy Holliday. The Marrying Kind is the story of their trials and tribulations in the first years of married life. Ray plays a New York Post Office employe who meets a girl in Central Park and, after a whirlwind courtship (movies, ice cream cones, Coney Island), marries her and settles down in a Manhattan housing-project apartment exactly like thousands of other average city dwellers. In the next few years they have fun, fights, two children, one major tragedy and the kind of domestic crisis innumerable young couples have gone through. How they face the latter and what follows provide the climax of the film. Credit for keeping the picture a fascinating one up to and through the denouement is due to five people who had more than a hand in it. Ray and Miss Holliday prove almost ideal choices for the couples to whom the title refers. Each is endowed with a deceptively different sort of personality—looks, voice and manner that are personable yet seemingly uncultivated and therefore believable as those of the "people next door." Ray's unique high but gruff voice and his ability to project the feeling of a very real nice guy should make a top-tenner of him if he can avoid carbon-copy roles. Miss Holliday, on the other hand, shows she can modify her heretofore mannered delivery; she makes a touching and most believable wife and mother. Partly, possibly, because they are husband and wife, Garson Kanin and Ruth Gordon have written a script that, even if it is not wholly original in conception, justifies the title's generalization. The matrimonial give-and-take of their dialogue is not only amusing but has the ring of truth in it. And George Cukor's direction exhibits a masterful restraint appropriate to the "average"—but, as many couples have found it, exciting—subject.

Cast: Judy Holliday, Aldo Ray, Madge Kennedy.—Columbia.

MACAO

In Macao director Josef von Sternberg returns after twenty years to the China coast, the scene of one of his best-remembered films, Shanghai Express. But Macao is more of a milk train—a melodrama that never lives up to the early promise of its locale or the torrid reputations of its principals, Robert Mitchum and Jane Russell. The story appears to have been compounded of the more boring ingredients of a Chinese puzzle, and it is just about that intelligible. On a coastal steamer to Macao, Portuguese island seaport off south China, come Mitchum, an American of uncertain background, and café singer Jane Russell. Things begin to get complicated fast. Jane steals Bob's money and identification, and when they disembark, an American gangster who runs Macao's leading gambling house suspects that Bob is a New York cop sent to lure him back to the States for imprisonment. From here on in, complication piles on complication, mistaken identity on mistaken identity. All eventually ends well for the principals; at least it ends, which was probably the scriptwriters' best idea.

Cast: Robert Mitchum, Jane Russell, William Bendix.—RKO.

BELLES ON THEIR TOES

Few sequels live up to their predecessors, but Belles On Their Toes (a sort of "Life with Mother Gilbreth") achieves the same family-album quality that Cheaper By The Dozen evoked so successfully. Life of course was never like this, even with one's own loving family, but it's nice to remember it that way. Belles opens as white-haired, widowed Lillian Gilbreth (Myrna Loy) sits at her youngest daughter's graduation exercises. Her thoughts slip back to the year her husband died, and while she mentally reviews what has happened since, a long flashback tells the story on the screen. There was her attempt to provide for her family by taking up her husband's efficiency-engineering lectures where he left them off; her rebuffs because she was a woman, and her final success (one memorable night after she made a name for herself, the New York Engineers Club discovered her sex and refused her admission, although she was to be guest speaker). Mostly Mother Gilbreth remembers how all the members of the family pitched in and helped through the difficult years. But if they
